Section 214 of Wade on Notice is as follows: "The purchaser is not charged with notice from the record of conveyances from his grantor prior to such grantor's acquisition of title. In such cases the subsequent purchaser would not be estopped by the record of a mortgage from his grantor prior to the date of his grantor's deed. To hold otherwise would be to impose upon the purchaser the duty of examining the records indefinitely." And in § 216 the same author says: "Upon both principle and authority, it seems more consonant with the spirit of the recording acts to absolve purchasers from the duty of examining the records for conveyances from their grantors prior to the time when they had a title to convey."

In Wheeler v. Young, 76 Conn. 44, 55 Atl. 670, the rule is thus stated: "To carry this doctrine to the extent of giving priority to the title of one who, from his negligent failure to examine the records, has been induced to purchase land of a person having no title, over that of one who, without negligence, in good faith and for value, and without knowledge of such prior deed, has purchased after his grant, or has acquired title from one having both the legal and record title, is opposed to the principles of equity and to the spirit of our registry laws. . . . The doctrine of estoppel is one which, when properly applied, 'concludes the truth in order to prevent fraud and falsehood, and imposes silence on a party only when, in conscience and honesty, he should not be allowed to speak.' Van Rensselaer v. Kearney, 11 How. 297, 326, 13 L. ed. 703, 715."

In the case of Doswell v. Buchanan, 3 Leigh, 365, 23 Am. Dec. 280, the court uses this language: "The enrolment and registry acts of England and our recording acts are expressly declared to be made for the benefit of subsequent purchasers, to protect them from secret conveyances. These acts, then, ought not to be turned to the injury of those for whose benefit they were made, unless it be in obedience to some express provision contained in them. But there is none such. They declare that all deeds, etc., shall be void as to subsequent purchasers unless duly recorded; but they nowhere declare that such recording shall charge the subsequent purchaser with notice of the deed. If not recorded, the deed is void as to him; if recorded it is only so far valid that it passes to the bargainee the title it purports to convey, provided the bargainor had that title; if he had it not, the deed cannot pass it though recorded, nor will the putting it on record affect the conscience of a subsequent purchaser of the legal title, nor, of course, charge that title with the equity which the deed raised between the bargainor and the bargainee. The laws had no such intention, nor will their words bear such construction. That this is settled doctrine in England, there are many cases to show,"—citing numerous cases.

The court, in the case of Bingham v. Kirkland, 34 N. J. Eq. 229, thus discusses the effect that would follow if the record in such cases should be construed to give constructive notice: "It would involve a search against every person whom the title in its transmission had ever touched, not merely for the period during which such person held the title, but for a period anterior thereto, during which any encumbrance might have been made and still exist. Such a construction of the scope of the constructive notice, imputed to a subsequent purchaser by our recording acts, is opposed to the sentiment of the bar of this state as it has existed from the earliest period of their enactment. The system of searching practised, so far as I know or have been informed, without any deviation, has been to trace the line of record title, and search against each owner during the period that he held the title. The titles to the real estate in this state rest upon searches made in conformity to this view. And it is a sensible view. No one is supposed to convey or encumber property which he does not own. Non dat qui non habet."

In Blake v. Graham, 6 Ohio St. 581, 67 Am. Dec. 360, the rule is thus stated: "It is well settled that the record or registry of a deed is constructive notice only to those who claim through or under the grantor by whom such deed was executed. . . . In the last-named case (Bates v. Norcross, 14 Pick. 224), the court says: 'To hold the proprietors of land to take notice of the records of deeds, to determine whether some stranger has without right made conveyances of their lands, would be a most dangerous doctrine, and cannot be sustained with any color of reason or authority.' . . . These rules rest upon the obvious reason that a searcher can be fairly supposed to be made acquainted with the contents of such deeds only as, in the process of tracing link by link his chain of title on the record, necessarily pass under his inspection."

Judge Hare, in a note to the Duchess of Kingston's Case, 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 8th ed. § 734, says: "It necessarily tends to give a vendee who has been careless enough to buy what the vendor has not to sell, a preference over subsequent purchasers who have expended their money in good faith, and without being guilty of negligence." He was therefore opposed to a doctrine that was so unjust.

In the case of Ford v. Unity Church Soc. 120 Mo. 498, 23 L.R.A. 561, 41 Am. St. Rep. 711, 25 S. W. 394, to which there is a valuable and exhaustive note, the court quotes with approval the following language from Mr. Rawle's excellent work on Covenants for Title, as follows: "This rule, when applied to the case of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice, 'cannot harmonize with the spirit of the registry acts in force in this country, and leads to the position, which certainly cannot be considered as tenable, that a purchaser must search the registry of deeds not only from the time when his grantor acquired title, but also for a series of years before that time, in order to discover whether he had previously made any conveyance (though without title) to any other person; for, if he had, that person will, according to this doctrine, hold the estate as against this purchaser; and, if the property has passed through several hands, a similar search must be made' as to each." After making this quotation, the court uses this language: "He says nothing is more simple than what is termed 'the line of title.' It is that the first purchaser should search the registry for the deed to his vendor, and trace the title thence back to its source. If he finds no title in him, as would have been the case here, then it is his fault if he takes the deed. Now, as to the second purchaser, one who buys after the vendor acquires a title. He searches till he finds the deed to his vendor, and traces the title back to its source. He finds it regular, and that since his vendor acquired the title he has not conveyed to anyone else. He is not expected to look for conveyances from his vendor prior to the time the vendor acquired the title. 'Yet, as Mr. Rawle says, 'according to the practical effect of the doctrine now being considered, and apart from counter equities, the purchaser, having thus brought himself within all the provisions of the registry laws, is not protected at all, if his vendor had, before he acquired title, conveyed to another, with covenants, a title which was without existence or value.'"

The court announced the rule just stated, although the following statute was then of force: "If any person shall convey any real estate by conveyance purporting to convey the same in fee simple absolute, and shall not, at the time of such conveyance, have the legal estate in such real estate, but shall afterward acquire the same, the legal estate subsequently acquired shall immediately pass to the grantee, and such conveyance shall be valid, as if such legal estate had been in the grantor at the time of the conveyance."

The reasons which gave rise to the rule in such cases are (1) that the grantee is estopped by his conduct from relying upon the record as constructive notice to a subsequent purchaser for value, without notice, because he is guilty of an act of wrong by failing to exercise due diligence to ascertain whether his grantor has a good title, and thus by his negligence participates in casting a cloud upon the title of the owner; (2) a contrary doctrine would not only entail much inconvenience in searching the records, but would render titles to land, to a great extent, uncertain; such a result being against the spirit of the recording acts as well as against public policy.

The rule is especially applicable in the present case, for the reason that both the grantor and grantee had at least constructive notice of T. M. Richardson's title, not only from the fact that he was in possession, but from his recorded deed. The exceptions raising this question are overruled.

All other questions presented by the exceptions are either dependent upon the conclusions hereinbefore announced, or the appellant has failed to show that there was prejudicial error.

Judgment affirmed.

Annotation—Conveyance recorded before grantor obtained title as notice.

This note is supplemental to the note to Ford v. Unity Church Soc. 23 L.R.A. 561.

For taking deed from stranger to record title as constructive notice of instruments of record to or by him, see annotation following Brannan v. Marshall, ante, 787.

For rights of assignee of mortgage as against subsequent bona fide purchasers or encumbrancers relying on apparent discharge of the mortgage by the mortgagee, see the notes to Central Trust Co. v. Stepanek, 15 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1025, and Northrup v. Reese, L.R.A.1915F, 554.

It will be observed that in RICHARDSON v. ATLANTIC COAST LUMBER CORP. ante, 788, where a father having 165 acres sold the timber on 83 acres to a lumber company with warranty, his son at that time owning 15 acres, which he later conveyed to his father, who afterwards reconveyed them to the son, it was held that the record of the deed to the lumber company was not constructive notice to the son.

Under the general spirit of the recording laws, a conveyance recorded before the grantor obtained title is not constructive notice. Wheeler v. Young (1903) 76 Conn. 44, 55 Atl. 670; Breen v. Morehead (1911) 104 Tex. 254, 136 S. W. 1047, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 1285.

The rule, however, requires a search back to the date of the deed to a person; it is not satisfied by searching back to the time of the record of such deed. Higgins v. Dennis (1898) 104 Iowa, 605, 74 N. W. 9.

In Anderson v. Farmer (1916) — Tex. L.R.A.1918C.

Civ. App. —, 189 S. W. 508, the court said: "It is the settled law that a purchaser of land is not required to examine the records for previous conveyances executed by his grantor prior to the time the title held by such grantor originated; nor is he charged with notice by the record of such prior deed or mortgage given by such grantor previous to the origin of the title."

In Gallagher v. Stern (1915) 250 Pa. 292, 95 Atl. 518, where the owner of one half of certain property mortgaged the whole and later acquired the other half, judgments entered against him after he became owner of the whole were held superior to the mortgage as to the half acquired since the mortgage, the court following Calder v. Chapman (1866) 52 Pa. 359, 91 Am. Dec. 163, referred to in the earlier note, page 567.

In Breen v. Morehead (Tex.) supra, the court considered the question as if the deed given before title was obtained had worked an estoppel as against the grantor, but such deed was merely of right, title, and interest with a covenant against future claim.

In Wheeler v. Young (1903) 76 Conn. 44, 55 Atl. 670, it was held that a mortgagee in good faith and his assignee were not chargeable with notice of a recorded warranty deed made by the mortgagor before he took title. The court points out that the contrary doctrine would give priority to one who purchased in negligent failure to examine the records over an honest purchaser who had examined them, and that it would be opposed to the principles of equity and to the spirit of the registry laws, and quotes as follows: "To allow a title to pass by conveyance executed and recorded before it is acquired may therefore be a surprise on subsequent purchasers against which it is not in their power to guard, and is contrary to the equity which is the chief aim of the doctrine of estoppel as molded by the liberality of modern times." 2 Smith, Lead. Cas. 7th Am. ed. page 701, s. p. 634."

In this connection it may be noted that it was said in Chew v. Barnet (1824) 11 Serg. & R. (Pa.) 389, that a conveyance with warranty by one having only the equitable title is a mere contract to convey.

The opposing doctrine, of which Tefft v. Munson (1874) 57 N. Y. 97 (referred to in the earlier note), is a conspicuous example, was maintained in Ayer v. Philadelphia & B. Face Brick Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 84, 34 N. E. 177, where a mortgagor in a second mortgage covenanted against all claims, etc., except the first mortgage, a right of drainage, and an easement, and the first mortgage was afterwards foreclosed and the land reconveyed to the mortgagor. It was held that a subsequent grantee from him took subject to the second mortgage, although he had no notice of it and the mortgagor had been discharged in bankruptcy before he repurchased the land.

It may be noted that in Oliphant v. Burns (1895) 146 N. Y. 218, 40 N. E. 980, after land had been granted under a condition subsequent with a covenant to reconvey in a certain case, an agreement by the grantor as to such land, which was not a conveyance or mortgage, was held not to be constructive notice to one who took a mortgage from such grantor after the premises so granted under condition had been reconveyed by the grantee in such grant to the grantor, the court distinguishing Tefft v. Munson (N. Y.) supra, on the ground that there was here no estoppel. The agreement was one with a prior mortgagee of the aforesaid land and other property, who had released the aforesaid land, and was to the effect that all the mortgaged land except the part that might be retained by the grantee in the grant under condition should be sold by the mortgagor and a certain portion of the proceeds should be paid to the mortgagee.

In Donovan v. Twist (1903) 85 App. Div. 130, 83 N. Y. Supp. 76, it was held that a purchaser from an heir took title free from a mortgage by the ancestor, made and recorded three days before such ancestor took title, which had no covenant of seisin or warranty. The same rule was laid down on appeal after a later trial in (1905) 105 App. Div. 171, 93 N. Y. Supp. 990, where, however, a judgment against the mortgagee was reversed on another ground.

But a recorded mortgage without covenants of title, made by a vendee in possession under an unrecorded contract of purchase, was held, as to the amount paid on the contract, superior to a mortgage given by such vendee after he took title, but inferior to such later mortgage as to the balance over such amount so paid. Gray v. Delpho (1916) 97 Misc. 37, 162 N. Y. Supp. 194.

There are a number of cases holding that recorded instruments made by one who has entered lands under state or United States laws are notice to those who claim under him after he obtains the legal title.

So, where A entered under the United States Homestead Laws, and made a deed of trust to secure a note to B, and commuted his homestead entry into a cash entry, and after getting final receipt made another deed of trust to secure a debt to D, and later got a patent, it was held that D took with constructive notice of the first trust deed. Dickerson v. Bridges (1898) 147 Mo. 235, 48 S. W. 825.

In Osceola Land Co. v. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. (1907) 84 Ark. 1, 103 S. W. 609, the court expressed the opinion that a purchaser of a state's certificate of entry from the widow and heirs of the enterer must take notice of the record of a warranty deed given by the enterer before the issuance of the certificate to him.

In Bernardy v. Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. (1904) 17 S. D. 637, 106 Am. St. Rep. 791, 98 N. W. 166, A, having made a timber culture entry on United States land, conveyed it to B by deed purporting to grant it in fee simple, dated 1890 and recorded in 1891, and in 1893, after making final proof, he mortgaged it to C. In 1895 A received a United States patent for the land. It was held that B's title was superior to one claiming under a foreclosure of the mortgage, the statute providing that, "where a person purports by proper instrument to grant real property in fee simple, and subsequently acquires any title or claim of title thereto, the same passes by operation of law to the grantee or his successors." The court quoted also from the recording statute, that "the recording and deposit of an instrument . . . are constructive notice of the execution of such instrument to all purchasers and encumbrances [encumbrancers] subsequent to the recording," and stated: "It will be further observed that no exception is made in the Code of conveyances made prior to the acquiring of the legal title when such conveyances are duly recorded," and considered that one claiming under a grantor has constructive notice of conveyances made by him before he acquired the legal title. The court stated further that the view that it had taken of the registration laws was strengthened by the statute requiring "a numerical index to be kept of both city and farm property."

Bernardy v. Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. (S. D.) supra, was followed in Tilton v. Flormann (1908) 22 S. D. 324, 117 N. W. 377, holding that one claiming under a grantor who had a United States patent for the land took with constructive notice of a recorded deed with covenants made by his grantor before he received the patent.

In Adam v. McClintock (1911) 21 N. D. 483, 131 N. W. 394, it was held that the recording of a mortgage given by an unmarried woman containing covenants of title, etc., in the office of the register of deeds of the county, prior to final proof on the land, is constructive notice to the same effect as though the mortgage had been executed and recorded after the recording of the patent, and therefore is such notice to her husband, whom she married before completing her five years' residence under the Homestead Law, the statute providing that "title acquired by the mortgagor subsequent to the execution of the mortgage inures to the mortgagee as security for the debt in like manner as if acquired before the execution."

The recorded conveyance by a homesteader after making final proof, but before receiving his patent, is in the chain of title, and therefore constructive notice. Peterson v. Sloss (1905) 39 Wash. 207, 81 Pac. 744.

In Balch v. Arnold (1899) 9 Wyo. 17, 59 Pac. 434, it was held that a mortgagee whose mortgage was made by one who took title from the United States has constructive notice of a recorded mortgage made by the same mortgagor before he took such title, when the statute requires the register of deeds to enter an abstract of such instruments under the survey subdivisions.

Purchase money mortgages.

A purchase money mortgage is superior to a mortgage by the mortgagor made and recorded before he took title (Hinton v. Hicks (1911) 156 N. C. 24, 71 S. E. 1086), or recorded before he took title (Daly v. New York & G. L. R. Co. (1897) 55 N. J. Eq. 595, 38 Atl. 202, affirmed in (1898) 57 N. J. Eq. 347, 45 Atl. 1092).

So, where the mortgage to the third party, though dated after the other papers, was recorded with the deed and before the mortgage to the vendor. Protection Bldg. & L. Asso. v. Knowles (1896) 54 N. J. Eq. 529, 34 Atl. 1083, affirmed in (1896) 55 N. J. Eq. 822, 41 Atl. 115.

A grantor taking back a purchase money mortgage need not examine the records for encumbrances by the mortgagor. Ely v. Pingry (1895) 56 Kan. 17, 42 Pac. 330; Continental Invest. & Loan Soc. v. Wood (1897) 168 Ill. 421, 48 N. E. 221, where the grantee made a mortgage to a third party dated later than, but delivered before, the deed to her and the mortgage to her grantor, the third party knowing of the last-mentioned deed and mortgage.

In Schoch v. Birdsall (1892) 48 Minn. 441, 51 N. W. 382, it was held that a vendor's purchase money mortgage was superior to a mortgage of earlier date and record, made by the vendee to a third party, of which the vendor had no knowledge, although the third party supplied the vendee with money to make the cash payment to the vendor.

Where, after a remainderman had mortgaged the property as if he held the entire estate, the life tenant quitclaimed to the remainderman, who gave a trust deed to secure the purchase money, such trust deed is superior to the earlier mortgage, though that was of record before the quitclaim was given. Wendler v. Lambeth (1901) 163 Mo. 428, 63 S. W. 684.

Miscellaneous.

It may be noted that, under the Tennessee statute whereby a deed registered with a defective certificate of acknowledgment or probate becomes notice only after it has been registered for twenty years, A conveyed to B by deed dated and recorded in 1851, B reconveyed to A by deed dated 1851, recorded 1856, and B conveyed to C by deed containing a general warranty of title dated and recorded in 1859, all three deeds having defective certificates. It was held that a purchaser from B's devisee in 1901 must take notice of C's deed. Hitt v. Caney Fork Gulf Coal Co. (1910) 124 Tenn. 334, 139 S. W. 693.

The existing record of a mortgage made by a stranger is not notice to the owner of the land who later mortgages it to such stranger. Turman v. Sanford (1901) 69 Ark. 95, 61 S. W. 167.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

THE KAISER WILHELM II.

(246 Fed. 786.)

Evidence — judicial notice — war.

1. The court will take judicial notice of the entry of the country into war and of an executive order taking over vessels of the enemy found in its ports.

For other cases, see Evidence, I. d., in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Admiralty — suit between belligerents — dismissal.

2. The courts of a neutral nation should not dismiss a libel filed by a citizen of one belligerent against a vessel belonging to a citizen of another to enforce a lien for repairs which enabled the vessel to reach the neutral port, although a moratorium of the country where the vessel was owned forbade its citizens to pay debts owing citizens of the other nation pending the war; and this is especially true if, after the libel was filed, the neutral country declared war upon that where the vessel was owned, and took the vessel into its service.

Same — retention of case until termination of war.

3. Upon refusing to dismiss a libel in admiralty for repairs to a vessel belonging to a citizen of one belligerent by a citizen of another belligerent, the court should hold the case to give the owner of the vessel an opportunity to present his proof, although a state of war exists between his nation and that where the court is sitting.

(December 28, 1917.)

APPEAL by libellant from a decree of the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey, Thomas G. Haight, Judge, dismissing a libel filed to enforce a lien for repairs made on the libellee vessel. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Buffington, McPherson, and Woolley, Circuit Judges.

Note.—The rights of enemy aliens as litigants are discussed in the annotation following Taylor v. Albion Lumber Co. L.R.A.1918B, 189.

Messrs. Burlingham, Montgomery, & Beecher, Roscoe H. Hupper, and H. Alan Dawson for appellant.

Messrs. J. D. Bedle and Walter C. Noyes for appellee.

Buffington, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case, Harland & Wolff, Limited, a British corporation, filed a libel against the steamship Kaiser Wilhelm II., owned by the North German Lloyd, a German corporation, for repairs made to that vessel in libellant's shipyard in England. By its answer, the North German Lloyd admitted the admiralty jurisdiction of the court below in the premises, but contended such jurisdiction should not be exercised in the present instance, because the countries of both litigants were at war with each other, and that prior to the filing of this libel the Imperial Government of Germany issued a moratorium whereby payment of all indebtedness by German to British subjects was forbidden during the war. It was therefore contended that the present enforcement of this claim would compel such German subject to violate the law of its country, and thereby subject itself to pains and penalties. To this answer the British libellant filed exceptions which, in substance, alleged that the facts set forth in the answer did not constitute a defense to the libel. On hearing, the court, in an opinion reported at 230 Fed. 717, sustained the contention of the North German Lloyd and subsequently entered a decree dismissing the libel. From such decree this appeal was taken. But pending such appeal, and at the hearing in this court, the whole situation was changed by two facts: First, the existence of war between the United States and the Imperial Government of Germany; and, second, the libeled ship, the Kaiser Wilhelm II., was taken over by the United States Government by the order in the margin.<sup>1</sup>

Whereas the following Joint Resolution adopted by Congress was approved by the President May 12, 1917:

"Joint Resolution authorizing the President to take over for the United States the possession and title of any vessel within its jurisdiction, which at the time of coming therein was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of

This being an appeal in admiralty, this court has authority to consider the case de novo. Irvine v. The Hesper, 122 U. S. 256, 30 L. ed. 1175, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1177. And, of course, it will also take judicial notice of the change of situation noted above. That the court below had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, if it saw fit to exercise it, is assumed, and the question before that court was therefore as to the propriety of exercising such jurisdiction. Manifestly, the exercise of jurisdiction by the courts of a neutral nation between citizens of belligerent powers is a delicate one, and in this case whatever course was followed there would be reasonable complaint by the unsuccessful litigant. For, while the German citizen could assert the enforcement of the claim compelled it to pay a debt its government had forbidden it to pay, the British citizen could with equal weight complain that the German vessel had sought protection in an American port; it was enabled to do so through the very repairs the libellant made; the libellant had a lien for such helpful repairs on such vessel; that such lien might be lost if the cause were dismissed, and that it would be an unneutral act if it were turned out of court. Bearing in mind the further fact that the Kaiser Wilhelm II., even if this case were dismissed, could not have gone to sea for fear of capture, and that retention of jurisdiction in no way hindered, and dismissal of the libel in no way furthered, the use of the vessel by its German owners, we are of opinion the court below should not have dismissed the libel, and that its decree should be reversed.

Moreover, the two facts which have come to pass meanwhile, viz., the war with Germany and the taking over of the vessel by the United States Government, give further support to this conclusion, for the action of the government, in taking over the libeled vessel, changed the practical effects of the decree prayed for when the libel was filed, in that such decree is not now enforced against a German citizen, or its property, but in substance and effect would be, if a decree were finally entered as hereafter noted, against a vessel held by the United States. This vessel, now taken by the government as noted, may hereafter be lost, burned, or destroyed, and if the lien be not finally enforced against her in this proceeding, or the hold of the court upon her be surrendered, it is manifest that the North German Lloyd might, after the war was ended, still remain liable to the libellant for the repairs on the ship, no matter what became of her. The practical effect, therefore, of our dismissing this libel, might eventually work a hardship to the North German Lloyd. So, also, the changed situation makes the British libellant's nation and our own allies in this war, and it might well be regarded as a well-nigh hostile act on the part of the United States district court to refuse to exercise its any nation with which the United States may be at war, or was under register of any such nation, and for other purposes:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the President be, and he is hereby authorized to take over to the United States the immediate possession and title of any vessel within the jurisdiction thereof, including the Canal Zone and all territories and insular possessions of the United States except the American Virgin Islands, which at the time of coming into such jurisdiction was owned in whole or in part by any corporation, citizen, or subject of any nation with which the United States may be at war when such vessel shall be taken, or was flying the flag of or was under register of any such nation or any political subdivision or municipality thereof; and, through the United States Shipping Board, or any department or agency of the government, to operate, lease, charter, and equip such vessel in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise.

"Sec. 2. That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to appoint, subject to the approval of the President, a board of survey, whose duty it shall be to ascertain the actual value of the vessel, its equipment, appurtenances, L.R.A.1918C.

and all property contained therein, at the time of its taking, and to make a written report of their findings to the Secretary of the Navy, who shall preserve such report with the records of his department. These findings shall be considered as competent evidence in all proceedings on any claim for compensation."

And whereas the following vessels were, at the time of coming into the jurisdiction of the United States, owned in whole or in part by a corporation, citizen, or subject of the Empire of Germany, a nation with which the United States is now at war, or were flying the flag of or under the register of the Empire of Germany, or of a political subdivision or municipality thereof: The Kaiser Wilhelm II. [and eighty-seven other named vessels].

It is therefore ordered that through the United States Shipping Board there be taken over to the United States the possession and title of the aforementioned vessels. The United States Shipping Board is further hereby authorized to repair, equip, and man the said vessels; to operate, lease, or charter the same in any service of the United States, or in any commerce, foreign or coastwise; and to do and perform any and all things that may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of the Joint Resolution above set forth.

jurisdiction in behalf of a British citizen. It is manifest the ship cannot now be returned to the German subject, just as it could not have been really returned to such owner for use at any time since the libel was filed. Therefore there is no practical reason why jurisdiction should be declined on the ground that retention was an unneutral act when we were at peace with Germany, or is now an unjust act toward the citizen of a country with which we are at war. The fact that the ship has now been taken from the possession of the court by the government would not prevent the court from hereafter adjudicating the several rights of the parties litigant if possession of the ship should later be restored, or if the government saw fit hereafter and of its own accord to pay into court such amount as would satisfy this lien. It is apparent, therefore, that no harm can be done to the two litigants or to the government by the lower court retaining jurisdiction of the libel for the present. If, as is no doubt the case, the counsel for the German claimant cannot at this time properly procure proofs and present his client's case, the court can, and no doubt will, delay action until this can be done. On the other hand, retention of jurisdiction may afford a tribunal for hereafter deciding questions which might possibly arise growing out of the seizure of this and other vessels by the government, if the government should desire an adjudication by a court of last resort.

This case is exceptional in its situation, and calls for the exercise of that range of discretion which the broad powers of a court of admiralty enable it to exercise. Such broad powers and range of discretion are, in our judgment, fittingly exercised by an order which will make due provision for, first, giving the German citizen and belligerent an opportunity to litigate his rights if relations with his country are hereafter resumed; second, providing for ad-judging, if the government hereafter so desires, its rights and liabilities, if any, in taking over libeled property of the German subject; third, adjudging hereafter what effect the taking of this ship by the government had on the claim of the British lienor, and the further obligation of the German vessel owner as between themselves.

In following this course, and protecting the unprotected rights of an absent German citizen while this country is at war with the Imperial Government of its country, we are impelled by three all-sufficient reasons: First, the innate sense of fairness, decency, and justice, which respects the rights of an enemy; second, the broad principles of international intercourse, which lead courts and nations that believe in international rights, to be the more careful to observe them toward belligerents; and lastly, because the awarding to this German citizen, with whom our country is at war, the careful preservation until times of peace of its rights, is in line with those high ideals of Anglo-Saxon justice which led the British courts years ago, in Ex parte Boussmaker, 13 Ves. Jr. 71, 33 Eng. Reprint, 221, 9 Revised Rep. 142, decided in 1806, to allow the claim of an alien enemy to be proved in time of war and the dividends held by the British court until peace. Indeed, the fact that our country is now at war with Germany is all the more reason why this court should most scrupulously award to this German citizen those international and equitable rights which no fair-minded people ever deny, even to their enemies in times of war.

We are therefore of opinion the decree of the court below should be reversed, the libel reinstated, with leave to the court and parties to take such further steps and proceedings in the case as are not at variance with the views above indicated, and that a certified copy of this opinion be furnished by the clerk to the State Department and the Department of Justice of the United States.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Cerro Gordo County in favor of defendant in an action brought to restrain it from discriminating against plaintiff, and from refusing to handle its shipments for rates and charges made to others for the same service. Affirmed.

Statement by Gaynor, J.:

Action in equity for a mandatory injunction requiring defendant to accept in payment for services rendered in handling freight for the plaintiff a sum less than the published tariff rate for long-distance haul, on the theory that the services were in the nature of switching service, or, if not, that defendant had so construed the service in that it hauled for others in a like situation and charged for so doing as for a switching service.

Messrs. Senneff, Bliss, Witwer, & Senneff, for appellant:

Switching service, as distinguished from train service, is the movement of cars by means (ordinarily) of switch engines and crews within railroad yard limits.

defendant's line. Thereupon defendant's switching crew took the cars and hauled them north upon its main line until it reached the Quimby spur, and there switched them on the Quimby spur.

It appears that the plaintiff had a contract to erect a bridge just north of this Quimby spur over a creek, and this sand and gravel were shipped for the purpose of completing that contract. The gravel was shipped over these two roads from the gravel pit to the Quimby spur, or to the point where it was switched to the Quimby spur for the use of the plaintiff. It was received by the Milwaukee Company at a definite point on its road, and by both companies, each in its turn, carried to a definite point on defendant's road. The only switching that seems to have been done was shunting the cars from the spur track that led to the gravel pit onto the Milwaukee main line, and then further switching at the junction from the Milwaukee main line to the defendant's main line. They were there transported on defendant's main line from the junction to the point opposite the Quimby spur, and there shunted onto the Quimby spur for the use of the plaintiff. The services rendered by these companies, for which the charges were made, were the services from a definite initial point to a definite terminal point.

It is apparent that the only service rendered for which the charge is made is a service in transporting the gravel from the gravel pit, over the Milwaukee and defendant's roads, to the Quimby tract. No services were rendered by either company other than are involved in the act of transferring this sand from one definite point to another. A line haul has been defined to be the transportation of property from an initial point to a terminal point. In the line haul, switching may be, and sometimes is, an incident. It is an incident to the line haul. Switching is a part of the transportation. It is an incident to the transportation. It either precedes the initial shipment in the transferring of goods to a point for shipment, or it follows a shipment and is a transferring of goods from the terminal point of the shipment to the place of actual delivery on spurs or switch tracks. Here the services rendered constituted the carrying of goods from the initial point at which they were received to the point of delivery. The carriage was over both roads. The services charged are for the services of both roads. The switching at the junction was an incident to the transportation, and we think it is immaterial whether this was done by a switching crew or otherwise. It is the character of the service that determines whether it be a line haul or a switching service. Switching or transfer service is one which precedes or follows a transportation service, and applies only to a shipment on which legal freight charges have already been earned, or are to be earned. See Dixon v. Central of Georgia R. Co. 110 Ga. 173, 35 S. E. 369.

When goods are received at a definite point on one road for shipment to a definite point on another road, switching may precede as an incident to the preparation of the shipment, and switching may intervene in transferring from one road to the other, and switching may follow in transferring from the point at which it was received on the line of the receiving carrier to its team tracks or industrial sidings on its own line yet the character of the service remains the same. It is a definite service rendered between two definite points, an initial and a terminal, and the switching becomes merely an incident to the haul. Terminal facilities, switching tracks, team tracks, and spur tracks to industrial sidings are merely conveniences at the destination or initial point of the transportation, and are aids in the preparation at the beginning or in the completion at the end of a haul, and it would seem to be wholly immaterial that the initial point at which the goods are received for transportation and the point of delivery are within the industrial limits or switching district of the receiving company. The switching service is but an incident to a line haul. Switches, team tracks, industrial sidings, and spur tracks are necessary to prevent the congestion which would result from requiring all carload freight to be delivered at the freight depots of the respective roads, and, in a very proper sense, are shipping stations. The fact that the freight movement begins and ends within the limits of the city does not take from it its character of an actual transportation between two terminals. See also J. B. Doppes Sons Lumber Co. v. Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. 92 Ohio St. 206, L.R.A. 1916D, 452, 110 N. E. 640.

Our conclusion is that switching is an incident to a line haul, and that there is no such thing as "switching service" technically, independent of a line haul. We conclude on this first point that the services rendered were line haul services, and that the defendant is entitled to the tariff rate fixed for line haul services in the amount demanded by the company, unless defeated by the matters to which attention is herein-after called.

It is the claim of the plaintiff that, even if as a matter of fact it be a line haul, the defendant is not entitled to exact the sum demanded for these services, for the reason that by its conduct it has construed the services rendered to be a switching service.

and has exacted from other companies situated like this company is situated, and under practically the same conditions, payment as for a switching service, to wit, $2 for the Milwaukee and $2 for the defendant company, and that to allow defendant now to charge this company more than it charged other companies would be to permit it to discriminate unjustly between this company and the others, to its great prejudice.

It is conceded in the stipulation on which this case was submitted that during the year 1914 carload lots of clay products consigned from the Mason City Brick & Tile Company, American Brick & Tile Company, North Iowa Brick & Tile Company, to the Decker Packing Plant, city of Mason City, the Lehigh Portland Cement Company, and the Northwestern Portland States Cement Company, were delivered by the defendant company to said companies on a charge of $4 per car, which charge consisted of the switching charge of the Milwaukee Company of $2 and the switching charge of $2 for the defendant company; that such carload lots were intended for the use of the consignees, and that each of the consignees had an industry located on a track of the defendant company, or a track connected therewith; that the delivery of said cars to said consignees was made by delivery upon the particular track of the consignee; that the movement of the cars was had by switching engines on both roads.

It was further conceded that the Mason City Sand & Gravel Company, a company connected by spur track with the Milwaukee, and just south of plaintiff's plant, consigned carloads of sand and gravel, under similar circumstances and under like conditions, to all or some of the above-named consignees, and that the sand and gravel were handled as in this case.

It is also conceded that the Mason City Sand & Gravel Company consigned certain carloads of sand and gravel to themselves, under like circumstances as attended the shipment in question, at the rate of $4 per car.

It is further admitted that the rates and charges demanded by the defendant company on the carload shipments of sand and gravel involved in this action were and are in accordance with the published tariffs of the defendant company and the Milwaukee Company in force at the time the shipments were made for line hauls.

It is further admitted that the railroad commissioners, under the provisions of § 2125 of the Code, as amended, by the Thirty-fourth General Assembly, chap. 95, § 1, has never taken any action to define or establish a switching district or define an industrial vicinity in Mason City.

It is further admitted that the yard limits of the Milwaukee road are within Mason City, and that the leads to the Quimby Company are within the Mason City yard limits of the defendant company, as are also the consignees to which the consignments have been made, as hereinbefore indicated.

It was further admitted that the published tariff rates of the defendant company in force at the time of the movements of the cars in question contained this provision: "Public team tracks or sidings, etc., of the defendant company, the M. S. N. Ry. Co. and S. I. T. for loading or unloading cars are exclusively for handling their track unless otherwise provided."

It is further conceded that if the plaintiff's theory is right the defendant is entitled to have judgment against the plaintiff at the rate of $4 a car for the cars shipped, or $156, and no more; that if the defendant's theory is correct the amount demanded by the defendant should be assessed against the plaintiff; to wit, $511.81.

The court found for the defendant. Plaintiff appeals.

Out of the stipulation arises this question, Does the fact that the defendant charged and received from other companies a less rate for services like that rendered in this case than it is now demanding of the plaintiff prevent the defendant from recovering of the plaintiff its published tariff rate for line haul services? Or, in other words, has the defendant, by its conduct in dealing with these other companies, so construed the services rendered that it is not now in a position to assert against the plaintiff that it is entitled to a larger sum for the services rendered than exacted from others for like services? Or, in other words, does the statute against discrimination stand in the way of its recovering more than it charged and received from other companies for like services, under like conditions and situations?

We have found that the services rendered were line haul services. The stipulation is that for such services, under the published tariff rate, the defendant is entitled to the sum demanded. Defendant is not asking more of the plaintiff than under the published tariff rate it is entitled to. Is it estopped from insisting that plaintiff pay the published tariff rate for this service because it has rendered for other companies the same service at a less rate? We have a statute against unjust and unfair discrimination, for a violation of which the legislature has imposed a penalty. We have also a statute making it unlawful for a company to charge or receive more or less than its published tariff rates. The fact, if it be a fact, that the defendant has violated the statute against unjust discrimination, cannot, we think, justify us in compelling the defendant, by decree or judgment, to violate the statute prohibiting it from charging or receiving more or less than the published tariff rate requires. It is no defense on the part of the plaintiff to say that the railroad company has violated this statute against unfair discrimination by charging others less than the tariff rate. To say this is to say, because you have once sinned, you must continue to sin. Moreover, is it a discrimination in the sense of the statute? Is the act of the defendant in insisting that this plaintiff pay no more and no less than the published tariff rate a discrimination against it, such as is contemplated by the statute? Was it the thought of the legislature that a violation of the published tariff rate in one or more instances would be a justification for a further violation? Would the fact that the company, in some instances, has violated the statute by charging a less rate for services rendered than was provided for in its published tariff rates, justify other parties in insisting that they too be served for a less rate than the published tariff rate fixed for the services rendered?

Is not the remedy, if there be any, found in the penal and other provisions of the statute lodged against unjust discrimination and a violation of the published tariff rate? Section 2125, Supplement Code 1913, provides: "It shall be unlawful for any common carrier subject to the provisions of this chapter to make or give any preference or advantage to any particular person, company, firm, corporation, or locality, or any particular description of traffic, in any respect whatsoever, or subject any particular person . . . or locality, or any description of traffic, to any prejudice or disadvantage in any respect whatsoever. . . . All common carriers subject to the provisions of this chapter shall, according to their respective powers, afford all reasonable, proper, and equal facilities for the interchange of traffic between their respective lines, and for the receiving, forwarding, and switching of cars, and for the receiving, forwarding, and delivering of passengers and property to and from their several lines, and to and from other lines and places connected therewith; and shall not discriminate in their accommodations, rates, and charges between such connecting lines. Any common carrier may be required to switch and transfer cars for another, for the purpose of being loaded or unloaded, upon such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Board of Railroad Commissioners. The switching service of common carriers is hereby defined to be the shifting of loaded or empty cars from one main line or siding to another main line or siding at an industry, or at a group of industries, or at a station, village, or city, and within its industrial vicinity, as may be defined by the Board of Railroad Commissioners, by means of switches and connecting tracks."

The theory of the law is that rates shall be uniform; that for like services a fixed rate shall be exacted and paid. The company has a right to fix the rates, but it must publish its tariff rates so that all may know the rate at which services may be demanded and received. These rates once fixed and published are binding upon the company while in force. For like services it can charge but the tariff rate to each shipper. If these rates are unfair or unjust, the railroad commissioners, upon application, may fix such rates as are reasonable. Section 2128 of the Code of 1897 provides: "Every common carrier . . . shall print and keep for public inspection schedules showing the rates, fares, and charges for the transportation of passengers and property which it has established, and which are in force at the time upon its railroad. . . . No advance shall be made in the rates, fares, and charges which have been established and published . . . except after ten days' public notice, which shall plainly state the changes proposed to be made in the schedules then in force [etc.]. When any such common carrier shall have established and published its rates [etc.], it shall not charge, demand, collect or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for the transportation of passengers or property, or for any services in connection therewith than is specified in such published schedule of rates . . . as may at the time be in force."

Section 2130 provides that for a violation of either of these statutes, or any of the statutes against which the statute is lodged, it shall be liable to the person or persons injured thereby for three times the amount of damages sustained in consequence, etc.

Section 2132 provides that for a wilful violation of any of these statutes the company shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction thereof, be fined not more than $5,000 or less than $500 for each offense.

Section 2138 provides that the rates thus fixed, in all actions against the railroad corporations wherein there are involved the charges thereof for the transportation of any freight or cars, or any unjust discrimination in relation thereto, shall be taken as prima facie evidence in all courts that the rates fixed therein are reasonable and just maximum rates of charge, for which said schedules have been prepared. These rates, however, are subject to supervision by the Railroad Commission.

Section 2139 provides for complaints to the Board of Railroad Commissioners of the unreasonableness of the rates fixed by the railway company.

Section 2140 provides for a hearing before the railroad commissioners as to the reasonableness of the rates fixed.

Section 2141 provides for a determination by the railroad commissioners of the reasonableness of the rates fixed, with power to fix rates that are reasonable.

On the trial of the case the following stipulation was entered into: "It is further admitted that the rates and charges demanded by the defendant company on carload shipments of sand and gravel involved in this action were and are in accordance with the published tariffs of the defendant company and the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, in force at the time said shipments moved, the same being $2 per car switching charge for movement on the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company tracks, and $.25 per ton for movement on the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company, except that, on those cars where the revenue collected by the Minneapolis & St. Louis Railroad Company under the said $.25 per ton rate exceeds $10, the defendant then assumed the payment of the said switching charge of the Chicago, Milwaukee, & St. Paul Railway Company, or so much of said switching charge as the amount collected by the defendant company under the $.25 per ton rate exceeds $10; that said $.25 per ton rate, it is admitted, is the published tariff charge for a haul of 5 miles or less, under the Iowa distance tariff then in force, said distance tariff being a schedule established by the Railroad Commission of the state of Iowa, and which schedule had been adopted by the defendant company in its published tariffs at the time the said shipments moved. The said $.25 per ton rate above mentioned is not a switching charge."

From this stipulation it appears that the amount demanded by the defendant was the published tariff rate for the services rendered. It therefore appears that defendant is demanding and exacting of the plaintiff only the rate fixed in its published tariff for the character of services which we find were actually rendered by the defendant. It follows, therefore, that the fact that the defendant company rendered like services for other industries at a less rate does not entitle the plaintiff in this case to insist that the defendant now further violate the law and its duty under the law, and charge the plaintiff a less sum than is so fixed in its tariff schedule.

When the defendant demands only what under the law it is entitled to, it is no defense to say that it has served other companies for a less rate than is demanded. Such contention makes no defense against the demand that the plaintiff pay for the services rendered the published tariff rate.

We have examined the Kentucky case reported in Crescent Coal Co. v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (Higdon v. Louisville & N. R. Co.) 143 Ky. 73, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 442, 135 S. W. 768, and are not persuaded by its reasoning to a different conclusion than we here reach. The rights demanded by the defendant were in accordance with the published tariff rates established by the Railroad Commission. To charge more or less than that rate for the services rendered is to violate the provisions of § 2128 hereinbefore referred to.

For the reasons hereinbefore set out, the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Preston, Ch. J., and Salinger and Stevens, JJ., concur.

STEWART SMITH et al.

Automobile — collision with overtaken wagon — negligence.

The driver of an automobile under control is negligent as matter of law in colliding with an overtaken wagon in broad daylight, on a road wide enough for him to pass in safety, merely because of miscalculation of distance, although the wagon was on the left of the center of the road.

recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Barrickman & Kaltenbacher for appellant.

Mr. W. T. Beckham for appellees.

Clay, C., filed the following opinion:

Dempsey Shaver, suing by his father as next friend, Lloyd Shaver, brought this action against Stewart Smith and Clarence Smith to recover damages for personal injuries. From a verdict and judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals.

It is insisted for plaintiff that the trial court should have held that defendants were negligent as a matter of law, and have submitted to the jury only the question of damages.

According to the evidence of plaintiff, he was 14 years of age when the accident occurred under the following circumstances: He had been to Shelbyville, and was walking home over the state pike. He was overtaken by Mr. Jeff Money, who was driving a spring wagon. Mr. Money invited him to ride, and he sat down beside Mr. Money on the front seat. After riding about half a mile, an automobile belonging to Clarence Smith, and driven by Stewart Smith, and used by them in conducting their partnership business, approached the wagon from the rear. Upon the sounding of the horn plaintiff told Mr. Money that there was a machine behind them. At that time the wagon was nearer the right side of the pike than the left. The pike was 25 or 30 feet wide, and there was plenty of room for the automobile to pass. When the automobile reached the wagon, the fender struck the wagon in the rear, and plaintiff was thrown to the ground and injured. His injuries consisted of a cut which had to be sewed up and several bruises and abrasions. At the time of the accident the machine was going at the rate of 10 or 12 miles an hour.

According to the evidence of Stewart Smith, the driver of the machine, he saw the wagon some distance away and sounded his horn. He was then going 7 or 8 miles an hour, and was on the left side of the road. The wagon was nearer the left side of the road than the right. As they approached the second culvert, he knew that he could not pass Mr. Money on the culvert. He then slowed down and followed Mr. Money over the culvert. In describing how the accident occurred, he said: "Just after he went over the culvert, I aimed to pass him, aimed to go around him. Of course, I was watching where I was driving, and didn't make quite allowance enough. I saw I was going to hit the wagon, and I stopped the machine as quick as possible."

At that time he was moving very slowly, and had the machine under perfect control. He further stated that he struck the wagon because the wagon was in the way, and he could not stop the machine before it struck the wagon. Roy Smith, a brother of the defendants, testified that the road at the place of the accident was 25 or 30 feet wide, and that two or three automobiles could have passed in that distance. Messrs. Fullenwider and Ware testified that they went to the place of the accident shortly after the accident occurred, and the tracks indicated that the brakes had been applied, and that the left wheels had slipped off the metal for a distance of 4 feet. When the machine began to skid they could not say.

The record discloses that the defendants not only denied the allegations of the petition, but pleaded contributory negligence on the part of the driver of the wagon as agent of the plaintiff, who was an infant and guest of the driver. It further appears that a demurrer was sustained to this plea, and the plea dismissed.

Here, then, we have a case from which the question of contributory negligence has been eliminated. The automobile was approaching the wagon from the rear. It does not appear that the wagon suddenly pulled in front of the automobile. The driver had the machine under perfect control. It was broad daylight, and the position of the wagon was known to the driver of the machine. Under these circumstances the machine collided with the wagon, and the only excuse that the driver of the machine offered is that the wagon was in the way, and he miscalculated the distance between his machine and the wagon. Even if the wagon was on the wrong side of the road and in the way, this did not give to the driver of the machine the right to run against the McLeod*, 111 Me. 234, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 971, 88 Atl. 721. On the other hand, if he ran into the wagon merely because he miscalculated the distance, there can be no question that the collision was due to his fault. Since the driver was under the duty to use ordinary care to avoid coming into contact with the wagon, and since the uncontradicted evidence shows that he failed to use such care, we conclude that the trial court should have directed the jury to find for plaintiff, and have left to the jury only the question of damages under a proper instruction.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial consistent with this opinion.

KENTUCKY COURT OF APPEALS.

J. A. SCOTT, Appt.,

v.

S. M. RATLIFF.

(179 Ky. 267, 200 S. W. 462.)

Condition — devolution of title.

1. A condition in a deed that the title should at once go to the grantee's children if creditors of the grantee sought to subject the property to their claims is valid.

For other cases, see Covenants and Conditions, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Deed — grant to children — rights of after-born children.

2. After-born children share equally with those living when condition is broken, in the benefit of a condition in a deed providing that upon an attempt by the grantee's creditors to subject the property to their claims the title shall at once go to his children.

Messrs. Hager & Stewart, for appellant:

A deed granting a fee-simple title cannot be loaded with conditions which destroy the grant.

A deed by a parent conveying land to his son, with a final provision that it does not take effect until the death of the grant-

In commenting upon this case, it was said in 19 L.R.A.(N.S.) 686, that in giving effect to a future estate created by a deed for the benefit of a class not definitely ascertained at the termination of the precedent estate, as a shifting use, the case seemed to be unique in the jurisprudence of this country.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question in this case is, Could the appellee, S. M. Ratliff, make a good title to a tract of land that she sold to the appellant, Scott? Whether she could or not depends on the proper construction of a deed made in 1878 by John H. Reynolds, and wife to their son Thomas Reynolds L.R.A.1918C.

the father of S. M. Ratliff. This deed recites: "That said party of the first part for and in consideration of the love and affection that we have for our (son) and for the further sum of one hundred dollars to be paid to Ann Sowards or her heirs in five years from this date do hereby sell and convey to the party of the second part his heirs and assigns the following described property, to wit: A certain part of the home farm that we now live on and bounded as follows: . . . To have and to hold the same, together with all the appurtenances thereunto belonging unto the party of the second part, his heirs and assigns forever. And the said party of the first part hereby covenant with the said party of the second part that they will warrant the title to the property hereby conveyed unto said party of the second part and his heirs and assigns forever. That is to say Thomas Reynolds is not to sell or convey said land to any person except to William Reynolds or C. Reynolds; and if said Thomas Reynolds should sell or convey to any other persons then in that event this deed shall be void and if said Thomas Reynolds should get in debt or any liability to sell said land then this deed shall be void and the land to go to his children and if he has no children then it shall go to his brothers and sisters and if Thomas Reynolds should die before his wife she is to live on said land her lifetime unless she should marry and in the event that she should marry then the land is to go to said Thomas Reynolds heirs at the date of said marriage. This deed is not to take effect until the death of myself and Cynthia Reynolds . . . my wife and at our death then this deed is to go into effect."

It stands admitted that in 1873 Thomas Reynolds, the grantee in the deed, became involved in debt, and as a result thereof judgment went against him, and the execution issued thereon was levied on the tract of land conveyed to him by his father. Thereafter the land was sold in satisfaction of the execution and purchased by the execution plaintiff, who had the sheriff make a deed to the land that he had bought to S. M. Ratliff, she having satisfied his execution debt. It is further admitted on the record that Thomas Reynolds, the grantee in the deed, is living and that S. M. Ratliff is his only child.

On behalf of S. M. Ratliff the argument is made that, as it was provided, in substance and effect, in the deed to Thomas Reynolds, that if he should get in debt and any creditor should undertake to subject the land to the payment of the debt then the deed to him should be void "and the land to go to his children, and if he has no children, then to his brothers and sisters;" and that as Thomas Reynolds did get in debt and the land was sold to satisfy his indebtedness, this at once divested him of the title and at once vested the title in his children, and as she was at the time and is now the only living child, the full title vested in her by virtue of the sale of the land as well as by the deed made by the sheriff, subject to the life estate of John Reynolds and his wife. It may however, be here observed that there is no controversy between the parties respecting this life estate.

On behalf of Scott the argument is made:

(1) That as the deed to Thomas Reynolds conveyed to him, in the granting clause, the fee-simple title, this title would not be impaired or divested by subsequent conditions in the deed; (2) that as Thomas Reynolds, the grantee, is yet living, and upon the defeasance, assuming it to be valid, the deed provided that the land should go to his children, S. M. Ratliff, although the only child of Thomas Reynolds, did not and would not become invested with a good, vendible title until the possibility of further issue to Thomas Reynolds was extinguished, and this could not reasonably be determined until his death.

As to the first proposition, it is the settled law of this state, as declared by this court, that the condition the grantor attached to the conveyance, providing that in the event any creditors of the grantee sought to subject the land, the title should at once go to his children, is a valid and enforceable one. Bull v. Kentucky Nat. Bank, 90 Ky. 452, 12 L.R.A. 37, 14 S. W. 425; Bottom v. Fultz, 124 Ky. 302, 98 S. W. 1037. And so when this condition in the deed was broken by the grantee, he was at once divested of title to the land, and the title at once vested in his children, or rather in his daughter, now S. M. Ratliff, as she was at that time his only child.

The remaining question is Did S. M. Ratliff take a fee simple title to the whole of the land, or did she take a title part of which, at least, was subject to be defeated by the birth of other children to the grantee, Thomas Reynolds? It is plain that if Thomas Reynolds, at the time he forfeited his title to the land, had had other children than S. M. Ratliff, the title would have gone to all of the children in equal shares. But it is contended that as S. M. Ratliff was at that time the only living child, the whole title vested in her, and having once vested, no part of it was subject to be defeated or taken away from her by birth of other children.

We do not find ourselves able to agree with this contention. It will be observed L.R.A. 1918C.

that the grantor did not say that the title should vest in the children of the grantee, Thomas Reynolds, living at the time the condition was broken, or use any words that could be construed to mean that he intended that the estate should go to the then living children of Thomas Reynolds, or that after-born children should be deprived of their equal shares in the land with the children living at the time the title devoluted from the grantee to his children. On the contrary, he used without limitation the broad word "children," thereby manifesting a purpose that all the children of the grantee should participate equally in the ownership of the land.

According to the construction placed on this provision by counsel for the appellee, if a child of the grantee had been born six months after the condition was broken, he would be denied the right to share in the land as much so as a child that might be born twenty years afterwards, because the whole argument rests on the proposition that when the condition was broken, the title immediately became vested irrevocably in the then living children of the grantee, as much so indeed as if the deed had been made to them in the first instance, or the children who should take when the condition was broken had been named in the deed to Thomas Reynolds.

It would further follow from this construction that if the grantee had no children when the condition was broken, the land would go under the deed to his brothers and sisters, who would likewise take the fee-simple title, of which they could not be divested, in whole or in part, by children subsequently born. The result of this would be that although the children of Thomas Reynolds, if he had any, were to be the first takers, and his brothers and sisters the second, his children if born subsequent to the devolution in the title would be deprived of all interest in the estate. This construction would certainly do violence to the expressed intention of the grantor, which was, as we think, that all the children of Thomas Reynolds, no matter when born, would take an equal share in the land. In other words, if only one child was living when the condition was broken, the title would go to that child, subject, however, to be opened up for the benefit of subsequently born children, who, as each was born, would take his equal share.

Accordingly we think that S. M. Ratliff never had and will not have until the death of Thomas Reynolds without further issue the fee-simple title to the whole of this land. The construction we have adopted is in harmony with many opinions of this court construing the meaning of the word "children" in deeds and wills in cases presenting questions whether children living at the time the title vested in the children under some condition in the deed or will took the whole estate to the exclusion of after-born children. Thus in Barker v. Barker, 143 Ky. 66, 135 S. W. 396, the devise was to Mrs. Caroline M. Stites, and in the event of her death before the will took effect, the property devised was directed to be "divided between the children of Richard N. Barker and Maxwell S. Barker, share and share alike." Mrs. Stites died before the testatrix, and the question in the case was whether the testatrix meant to give this property to the children of the Barker brothers referred to in the will who might be living at her death, or to them and such others as might be born thereafter to the Barker brothers. In that case upon a construction of the whole will the court held that it was the intention of the testatrix that only those living at her death should participate in the estate, but said: "At common law a bequest to a class was held to embrace all in the class at the time the bequest was to take effect, but where there was a postponement of the payment of the legacy until a period subsequent to the death of the testator, every person answering the description at the time fixed for the division was held entitled to participate as one of the class. . . . In this state, however, the common-law rule has not been followed, and in the cases of Lynn v. Hall, 101 Ky. 738, 72 Am. St. Rep. 439, 43 S. W. 402; Goodridge v. Schafer, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 219, 68 S. W. 411; Caywood v. Jones, 32 Ky. L. Rep.

1302, 108 S. W. 888; Gray v. Pash, 24 Ky. L. Rep. 963, 66 S. W. 1026; and United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Douglas, 134 Ky. 374, 120 S. W. 328, 20 Ann. Cas. 993, it is held that a bequest to the children of A would, in the absence of a contrary intent expressed in the will, include not only the children of A living at the death of the testator, but all such as might thereafter be born to him. It may be said that this rule of construction is now the well-settled law of this state; and in the absence of some expression in the will indicating a contrary intention on the part of the testatrix, the same principle would govern in the case at bar."

The rule announced in this case was also approved in Lamar v. Crosby, 162 Ky. 320, 172 S. W. 693, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 1033, in which a number of cases affirming it are cited. Another case in point is McCoy v. Ferguson, 164 Ky. 136, 175 S. W. 23. The cases of Mullins v. Moberly, 145 Ky. 477, 140 S. W. 652, Foster v. Shreve, 6 Bush, 519, and Turner v. Patterson, 5 Dana, 292, are relied on by counsel for appellee, but we find nothing in any of these opinions in conflict with the rule taken from Barker v. Barker.

It results from what we have said that the court committed error in sustaining a demurrer to the answer and counterclaim of Scott, and in effect holding that S. M. Ratliff conveyed to Scott a good title.

Wherefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer, and for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

Where a contract of insurance undertakes to indemnify against loss from liability imposed by law for damages on account of bodily injury or death in broad terms, the insurer will be held to the terms of the contract, although language may be found in a subsequent section which may be construed so as to defeat the insured's claim.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The appellee, Palmer Hotel Company, operated a hotel in Paducah, and there was issued to it by the appellant company a contract of insurance by which it obligated itself to indemnify the hotel company against loss occasioned by damages it might sustain on account of injury or death suffered by any person while a passenger in its elevator, subject to conditions that will be later noticed. While the contract was in force a passenger in the elevator sustained personal injuries which were caused by structural defects in the elevator, and not by the negligence of the operator, and brought suit against the hotel company to and did recover damages. Thereafter the hotel company brought this suit against the Fidelity & Casualty Company on its contract of insurance to recover the amount it had paid to the injured passenger. The Fidelity & Casualty Company defended the suit upon the ground that at the time the passenger was injured the elevator was being operated by an employee of the hotel company who was under sixteen years of age, and consequently it was exempt from liability by the stipulations in the contract of insurance, which, in the insuring clause, provided that "the Fidelity & Casualty Company of New York [hereinafter called the company] does hereby agree (1) to indemnify the person, firm, or corporation, named in statement 1 of the schedule of statements, and herein called the assured, against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the assured, for damages on account of bodily injuries or death suffered within the premises designated in statement 4 of the said schedule, as the result of an accident occurring while this policy is in force, by any person or persons while in the car of any elevator described in the statement, . . . subject to the following conditions: . . .

(B) This policy does not cover loss from liability for, or any suit based on, injuries or death suffered or caused by (1) any minor hired by the assured contrary to law, or any minor while performing any work contrary to law; (2) any child under fourteen years of age employed by the assured in any state in which there is no law restricting the age of employment in the assured's trade or business; (3) any person who is in charge of or is operating an elevator and is under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants, or any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants; (4) any person who is under eighteen years of age and is in charge of or is operating an elevator in any state in which there is no law restricting the age of elevator attendants, or any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of a person under eighteen years of age in any such state."

On a trial of the case in the lower court there was a judgment for the full amount claimed in favor of the hotel company, and the Fidelity & Casualty Company appeals.

It is admitted that the employee of the hotel company who attended the elevator and was operating it at the time the accident to the passenger occurred was under the age fixed by law in this state for elevator attendants, and so it will be seen that the question presented on this record is purely one of law, depending on the proper construction of paragraph B in the contract heretofore quoted, and especially clause 3 thereof.

Referring again to the contract, it will be noticed that the Fidelity & Casualty Company obligated itself to indemnify the hotel company against any loss suffered by it as a result of an accident to any person while in the car of its elevator, but provided that "this policy does not cover loss from liability for, or any suit based on, injuries or death suffered or caused by . . . (3) any person who is in charge of or is operating an elevator and is under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants, or any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants."

For the hotel company the argument is made that paragraph B should be construed to exonerate the insurance company from liability only in a suit brought to recover damages for injuries or death suffered (1) by a minor hired by the assured contrary to law or while performing any work contrary to law; or (2) by any child under fourteen years of age employed by the assured in any state in which there was no law restricting the age of employment; or (3) by any person under the age fixed by the law for elevator attendants; or (4) by any person in charge of or operating an elevator who was under the age of eighteen in a state in which there was no law restricting the age of elevator attendants. In other words, the contention is that the purpose of the insurance company in this paragraph was to relieve itself from liability in a suit to recover damages for injuries or death sustained by any infant of the class described in the paragraph who was injured or killed while operating an elevator or employed by the hotel company, and should be so construed. The further argument is made that to construe this paragraph so as to exempt the company from liability for injuries or death suffered by an adult passenger on the elevator, solely because at the time of the accident it was being operated by or in charge of one of the prohibited class, would be putting into the paragraph a meaning that it is not fairly susceptible of, although it is conceded that by interpolating or omitting certain words in the paragraph it might reasonably be construed to exempt the insurance company from liability for damages on account of injuries suffered by a passenger in the elevator while it was in charge of or being operated by one of the prohibited class.

On the other hand, counsel for the insurance company say paragraph B in connection with clause 3 should be construed as if it read: "This policy does not cover loss from liability for, or any suit based on, injuries or death suffered by . . . (3) any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants,"—and that accordingly the insurance company was not liable on its contract to indemnify the hotel company for the damages it was required to pay to the passenger who was injured in the elevator.

The contract could perhaps have been simplified and made plainer if the exemption from liability, on account of an accident to any person riding on the elevator when it was in charge of or being operated by any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants had been put in a separate clause; but we think this exemption feature as written in paragraph B was sufficiently clear to advise the insured that the policy did not cover accidents to passengers while the elevator was being operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants. To give to the contract the construction contended for by counsel for the hotel company would necessarily result in striking from paragraph B the words "or any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants," and this we do not feel authorized by any rule of construction to do.

Paragraph B, which contains only four short clauses, could not very well be read by any person of ordinary intelligence without understanding and appreciating the meaning of the sentence here in question. Evidently it was the intention of the draftsman of this paragraph to exempt the insurance company from liability not only for all accidents that might happen to any minor within the prohibited age while in charge of or operating the elevator, but to exempt it from liability for all accidents that might happen to any person riding on the elevator while operated by or in charge of such minor; and the reason doubtless for the insertion of this exemption clause was that minors within the prohibited age are not likely to be as prudent or as careful as older persons, or as apt to discover or call attention to or correct defects in the elevator or parts of it that might get out of repair. But whatever the reason for its insertion, it is in the contract, and the insurance company had the unquestioned right to insert as many exemption clauses as it thought proper to do.

A further argument is made by counsel for the hotel company that, as the accident and resulting injury suffered by the passenger who recovered damages from the hotel company was due to a structural defect in the elevator, and not to any fault or negligence on the part of the operator, the insurance company should not be allowed to escape liability under the contract. But if we should attempt to adopt this construction, we would be at once confronted by the words of the contract exempting the insurance company from liability for "injuries to any person in or about the elevator while operated by or in charge of any person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants." So that, giving to these exempting words their ordinary meaning and such meaning as they would have in common, everyday usage, it makes no difference what cause brought about the accident or injury, or how it happened. The exemption clause is sweeping in its terms, and the only fact necessary for the insurance company to establish to make the exemption from liability effective is to show that the elevator at the time the injury complained of happened was operated by or in charge of a person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants. The exemption of the company from liability does not depend on the fact that the injury was caused or brought about by some act of omission or commission on the part of the elevator attendant, but on the fact that a prohibited elevator attendant was operating or in charge of the elevator. When the elevator is being operated by a prohibited attendant it is wholly immaterial what cause produced or brought about the accident or injury or death to the passenger.

We have laid down in a number of cases certain generally accepted rules applicable in the construction of insurance contracts, which are thus stated in Spring Garden Ins. Co. v. Imperial Tobacco Co. 132 Ky. 7, 116 S. W. 234, 20 L.R.A.(N.S.) 277, 136 Am. St. Rep. 164, where the court said: "The companies had the unquestioned right to insert as many reasonable provisions in the policy exempting them from liability as they thought proper or necessary. We know of no rule of law that denies to insurance companies this privilege. They may limit the amount of insurance they will offer, may limit the species of property they will insure, may provide reasonable conditions that the insured must observe, as well as conditions that will in certain states of case operate as a forfeiture of the policies or waiver of the right of the insured to recover upon them, and may protect themselves from loss resulting from causes that they do not desire to offer indemnity against. Why then, should these words by which the companies undertook to limit their liability be stricken from the policies or ignored in their construction? They are not obnoxious to any principle of law or public policy. They are not surplusage. They are not in conflict with any other provisions in or words of the policies. They may be read harmoniously in connection with other and subsequent clauses, and when so read, become a material, intelligible part of the contract. They were inserted for a purpose, intended to have a meaning, are not of doubtful or uncertain import, and, when fairly and reasonably applied, they exempt the companies from loss by fire when the fire is caused by riot. In the construction of policies the same rule obtains as in the construction of other contracts, with the exception that a policy will be construed in favor of the insured so as not to defeat, without plain necessity, his claim to the indemnity which in taking the insurance it was his object to secure; and when the words are fairly susceptible of two interpretations, that which will sustain his claim and cover the loss must by preference be adopted. It may also be said that ambiguities, and words, sentences, or clauses of doubtful meaning, will be construed against the insurer; and this for the reason so often declared that the companies themselves prepare the policies with great care and deliberation, and, as the insured has no election except to accept them as prepared and presented to him, it is fair that they should be construed most strongly against the insurer and most liberally in favor of the insured, so that the purpose for which the insurance was obtained may be effectuated, if this can be done without doing violence to the contract. It is also a familiar principle, everywhere recognized in the construction of contracts, including contracts of insurance, that the intention of the parties is to be gathered from an inspection of the entire instrument; and that all parts of it, and all words employed, should be given meaning and effect, if this can be done."

Adopting this view of the manner in which an insurance contract should be looked at by the court, we see no escape from the conclusion that the clause in question exempted the insurance company from liability, and therefore the judgment is reversed, with directions to dismiss the petition.

Annotation—Elevator insurance.

The principles applicable to insurance indemnifying against liability for personal injuries have been treated in their various aspects in notes cited in the L.R.A. Indexes under the title, "Insurance," subtitle, "Guaranty policies."

This note deals with the question of the liability under policies insuring against loss or damage sustained on account of injuries resulting from the operation of passenger or freight elevators.

Generally, as to liability for injury to elevator passenger, see notes to Edwards v. Manufacturers' Bldg. Co. 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 744, and Tippecanoe Loan & T. Co. v. Jester, L.R.A. 1915E, 722.

There is at present little direct authority on the question under annotation.

With respect to the power of companies to issue policies of this kind, it has been held that "elevator policies" insuring against claims for compensation for accidental personal injuries caused to persons by the insured's elevator are a variety of accident insurance, it being an accidental personal injury which causes the right to the insurance money to spring up, and that companies formed or operating within a state which are authorized to insure against injuries by accident have power to issue such policies. Employers' Liability Assur. Corp. v. Merrill (1892) 155 Mass. 404, 29 N. E. 529.

It has been held that the parties to a contract of elevator insurance may lawfully include in the policy an agreement that the insurer shall not be liable if the insured's building and elevator are not completed ready for occupancy. Scarritt Estate Co. v. Casualty Co. (1912) 166 Mo. App. 567, 149 S. W. 1049.

But in this case, where the insurer's agent knew that the building and elevators were not fully completed, and accepted the elevators covered by the policy as completed ready for occupancy, and delivered the policy and collected and retained the premium, the company was held estopped from denying liability on account of an injury on the ground that the building and elevators were not completed.

In Western Warehouse Co. v. New Amsterdam Casualty Co. (1917) 85 Or. 597, 167 Pac. 572, a policy undertook to indemnify "against loss from the liability imposed by law upon the assured for damages on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered . . . by any person or persons while in the car of any of the elevators described in the schedule, or in the elevator well or hoistway thereof, or while entering upon or alighting from such car, subject to the following conditions: . . .

This policy does not cover . . . loss from liability from injuries or death suffered by or caused by . . . any person during the making of additions to or structural alterations in or extraordinary repairs of any elevator plant, unless a written permit is granted by the company specifically describing the works; but no elevator shall be used for any service while additions, alterations, or repairs of any kind are being made in or about such elevator." It was held that, considering both the positive and the negative terms of the policy, there could be no recovery where an employee was injured by being struck by the descending counterweights of an elevator while he was engaged in boarding up the sides of the elevator shaft, since he was not in the car, the well, or hoistway, or entering upon or alighting from the car, and since no permit had been obtained for the work which he was engaged in, and since the elevator was being used while the work was in progress in violation of the conditions of the policy.

It will be noticed that in Fidelity & C. Co. v. PALMER HOTEL Co. ante, 808, an exception in a policy insuring against liability for injuries on an elevator, that it did not cover loss from liability for, or any suit based on, injuries or death suffered or caused by any person in or about any elevator while operated by or in charge of a person under the age fixed by law for elevator attendants, was held to include a loss which resulted on account of an injury which occurred while the elevator was in charge of one under the age specified, although the injury was due to a structural defect in the elevator, and not to any fault or negligence of the operator.

It has been held that an insurer which issues a policy insuring against loss on account of bodily injuries accidentally suffered by persons using an elevator, and providing that the insurer shall at its own cost defend all suits, commits a breach of its contract where it has notice of a suit against the insured by one injured on his elevator and prepares to defend it, but a short time before the trial notifies the insured that he seems to be in sympathy with the person injured and advises him to have his own counsel present at the trial as the insurer's attorney may be compelled to withdraw from the suit; and the insurer is liable to reimburse the insured for the expense incurred in the employment of counsel to defend the suit, in the absence of evidence of any acts on the part of the insured with respect to the defense of the case which are prejudicial to the insurer. Anderson & I. Co. v. Maryland Casualty Co. (1914) 123 Md. 67, 90 Atl. 780.

It was further held in this case that a provision that the insurer would not be responsible for any expenses incurred by the insured unless they were first specifically authorized by the insurer in writing applied only where both parties were proceeding in accordance with the terms of the contract, and that the insurer's letter contemplated a possible rescission and not a performance of the agreement, and that the letter could not therefore be held to constitute an authorization of expenditures within the meaning of the clause of the policy.

Cases like Depue v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (1909) 166 Fed. 183, and Ætna L. Ins. Co. v. Davis (1911) 112 C. C. A. 87, 191 Fed. 343, passing upon the question as to when one is a passenger in an elevator within the provisions of an accident insurance policy, are not within the scope of the note. J. T. W.

HAVERHILL STRAND THEATER

v.

A. L. GILLEN et al.

(— Mass. —, 118 N. E. 671.)

Injunction — against enforcement of rules by labor union.

1. Injunction lies on behalf of an employer against the enforcement of an illegal rule by a labor union which will deprive him of his employees, although no boycott or strike has been put in force or threats made against him.

For other cases, see Injunction, I. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Labor organization — minimum employee rule — validity.

2. A rule of a labor union that to secure union labor an employer must employ not less than a specified minimum number, although a less number would be more advantageous to his business, and the employment of the number specified will result in pecuniary loss, is illegal.

For other cases, see Labor Organizations, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for determination by the Supreme Judicial Court, after confirmation of the Master's Report, of a question arising in a suit to enjoin enforcement of an alleged illegal rule of a labor union of which defendants were members. Injunction ordered.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

A combination by a group of individuals to prevent a single individual from obtaining labor is a legal wrong unless affirmatively justified.

Loring, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff corporation is a "moving picture and vaudeville house" in Haverhill. The defendants are officers and members of a labor union of musicians. They are also joined as representing the other members of it who are too numerous to be made parties defendant. For convenience we shall speak of the union as the party defendant. In the summer of 1916 the plaintiff had in its employ an organist, one Coburn by name, who was a member of the defendant union. He played an organ (part of the plaintiff's building) at all performances given by it, and the music of the organ was the only music furnished at these performances. Before 1916 the defendant had adopted a minimum rule fixing the number of musicians who should be employed in the different theaters in Haverhill. By this rule the plaintiff was required to employ an orchestra of five musicians if it wished to employ any member of the defendant union. The minimum rule had been suspended during the summer of 1916. At some time shortly before the filing of this bill the defendant notified the plaintiff that it was about to enforce the minimum rule so far as the plaintiff was concerned. "From motives of economy" the plaintiff wished to continue to employ Coburn and Coburn alone. Upon being informed of the defendant's intention to enforce the rule, the plaintiff brought this bill on September 9th, alleging that the rule was illegal, and asking that the defendant be enjoined from putting it in force. After playing at the performance on September 10th, Coburn left the plaintiff's employ "because of the existence of said rule and penalties incident to its violation," to quote the terms of one of the findings made by the master. It would seem that Coburn's wages were $27 a week, with one night off. Some time after Coburn left the plaintiff succeeded in hiring a nonunion organist, and it had to pay him $60 a week. The master's report ends in these words: "Upon the pleadings and the foregoing findings, general and special, the parties agree, without waiving their right to raise other questions, that the following question of law may be posited for the court: In the absence of boycott, strike, intimidation, or interference with existing contractual relations, does an unincorporated labor organization have a legal right to enact with penalty of fine or expulsion a rule which prevents its members from working for any employer unless said employer employs a given number of union men, and where, as a matter of fact, the operation of said rule narrows the labor market and restricts the field of competitive employment for the employer?"

The first contention of the defendant is that on the findings of the master the "plaintiff had acquiesced in the enforcement of the rule" here complained of, and that a decree dismissing the bill on that ground "would be well warranted on the findings." After making this suggestion counsel for the defendant seems to have waived it. But if the suggestion is not to be taken to have been waived, it is enough to say that on the findings of the master what was said by the plaintiff to the defendant was not sufficiently definite to amount to an agreement not to maintain this bill if it was entitled to do so.

The defendant's next contention is based upon the master's finding that "neither a boycott or strike [had been] put in force or threatened to be put in force" by the defendant before the bill now before us was brought; that the defendant had "in no wise disturbed or interfered with any existing contractual relations to which the plaintiff is a party," and that the defendant "in no wise threatened the plaintiff or its business" before the bringing of the bill. The three special findings here relied on, together with the finding already referred to and one other finding, are set forth in full below.<sup>1</sup>

The defendant's contention based upon these findings is that, in the absence of a strike or of threats on the part of the defendant, the present bill cannot be maintained. It is this contention without doubt which is referred to in the opening words of the question of law which the master says the parties agreed should be "posited for the court." This contention is without foundation. On the findings made by him

12. This rule is enforced against the members of the union by either fine or expulsion.

4. There has been neither a boycott or strike put in force or threatened to be put in force by the defendants or any of them against the plaintiff.

5. The defendants or any of them have in no wise disturbed or interfered with any existing contractual relation to which the plaintiff is a party.

6. The defendants or any of them have in no wise threatened the plaintiff or its business.

8. Coburn, the organist, refrained from working in the plaintiff's employ after September 10, 1916, because of the existence of said rule and penalties incident to its violation.

it must be taken that the master has found that the defendant did notify the plaintiff that it would enforce its minimum rule, but that the defendant made no threats to the plaintiff other than the notice that the rule would be enforced. The bill was brought (first) on the ground that the rule was an illegal one, and (second) on the ground that defendant had notified the plaintiff that they would enforce it. For the purpose of the question under discussion, it must be assumed that the rule was an illegal one. If a union notifies a plaintiff that they will enforce an illegal rule which operates to his prejudice he has a right to bring a bill to have the union enjoined from enforcing it. In the case at bar the master finds that the defendant union did notify the plaintiff that it would enforce the minimum rule, and the plaintiff proved the fact that the defendant did intend to enforce it when it proved that Coburn left "because of the existence of the rule and penalties incident to its violation." The contention that a plaintiff cannot bring a bill upon being notified that a combination of individuals will enforce an illegal rule which operates to his prejudice in the absence of a strike or threats of a strike or intimidation is founded on a misconception. Where a combination is a legal one, a plaintiff has a right to complain if the parties to the combination undertake to enforce it by illegal means. A boycott and threats of intimidation by using physical violence are illegal means of enforcing a legal combination. But a strike is one of the legal means which parties have a right to resort to to enforce a legal combination. On the other hand, when a combination is an illegal one the plaintiff has a right to have it enjoined in case it operates to his prejudice on proving the fact that the defendants intend to enforce it. He has no need to go further and prove that the defendants have threatened to enforce it by means which are illegal.

With this explanation the question propounded to the court by the agreement of parties is this: Is a combination between musicians a legal one by which a plaintiff is compelled to employ a number of musicians specified by the members of the combination if he wishes to employ any member of the combination, even though it be the fact that in the plaintiff's opinion the employment of a single musician is the most advantageous way of conducting his (the plaintiff's) business, and that the employment of more than one musician will cause him pecuniary loss? It is manifest that such a rule is an interference with a plaintiff's right to that free flow of labor to which every member of the community is entitled for the purpose of carrying on the business in which he or it has chosen to embark. The right to the free flow of labor is not an absolute right; it is limited by the right of employees to combine for purposes which, in the eye of the law, justify interference with the plaintiff's right to a free flow of labor. A combination which interferes with a plaintiff's right to a free flow of labor is legal if the purpose for which it is made justifies the interference with that right. On the other hand, it is illegal if that purpose does not justify the interference (which ensues from the making and enforcing of the combination in question) with the plaintiff's right to a free flow of labor. So much is settled in this commonwealth. See, for example, Plant v. Woods, 176 Mass. 492, 51 L.R.A. 339, 79 Am. St. Rep. 330, 57 N. E. 1011; Reynolds v. Davis, 198 Mass. 294, 17 L.R.A. (N.S.) 162, 84 N. E. 457; De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 598, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E. 317; Minasian v. Osborne, 210 Mass. 250, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 96 N. E. 1036, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1299; Burnham v. Dowd, 217 Mass. 351, 51 L.R.A. (N. S.) 778, 104 N. E. 841; Cornellier v. Haverhill Shoe Mfrs. Asso. 221 Mass. 554, L.R.A. 1916C, 218, 109 N. E. 643. It is also settled in this commonwealth that the question whether the purpose for which the combination is made does or does not justify interference with the plaintiff's right to a free flow of labor is a question of law for the court. De Minico v. Craig, 207 Mass. 593, 598, 42 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1048, 94 N. E. 317; Minasian v. Osborne, 210 Mass. 250, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 96 N. E. 1036, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1299; Cornellier v. Haverhill Shoe Mfrs. Asso. 221 Mass. 554, L.R.A. 1916C, 218, 109 N. E. 643.

There is no decided case in this commonwealth which has gone as far as we are asked to go in the case at bar, and with the exception of the case of Scott-Stafford Opera House Co. v. Minneapolis Musicians Asso. 118 Minn. 410, 136 N. W. 1092 (which is not law in this jurisdiction, as we shall point out later on), there is no decided case outside of this commonwealth which has gone so far.

No case has gone further toward supporting the defendant's contention than Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 Ann. Cas. 638. But that case does not go so far as to support that contention.

The question we have to decide in the case at bar is whether the doctrine of Pickett v. Walsh is to be extended. In Pickett v. Walsh a union of masons struck; that is to say, combined to refuse to lay bricks to get the work of pointing the mortar after the bricks were laid. The contractor wished to give the work of pointing to men known as pointers, who had that and that alone as their trade. In that case the complaint was made by the pointers. But that is not material. It was held that the purpose for which the combination was made, namely, to get work for members of the union, was a justification for the interference with the pointers' right to be employed to do the work, and, as a consequence, that the combination was a legal one. But in that case the contractor wanted the pointing done. The peculiarity of the case at bar is that the work which the defendants have combined to force the plaintiff to give them is work which the plaintiff does not want done; not only that, but it is work which, if done at the plaintiff's expense, will cause him pecuniary loss. The difference between Pickett v. Walsh and the case at bar is that in Pickett v. Walsh the defendants combined for the purpose of getting work which the employer wanted done, while in the case at bar the purpose of the defendants' combination is to force the plaintiff to make work for them when he does not wish to have that work done and when that work will result in a pecuniary loss for him. The question is whether a combination by a union for the purpose of getting work for the members of it in this indirect way is a justifiable interference with the plaintiff's right to a free flow of labor.

The consequences of holding a combination for such a purpose to be a legal one are far reaching. If it is legal for a union of musicians to combine for the purpose of forcing a plaintiff (who wants an organist only) to employ an orchestra of several pieces,—that is to say, if that indirect purpose of enabling the union musicians to earn more money justifies the adoption of the minimum rule,—it is hard to see why it is not legal for a union of carpenters (for example) to refuse to work on a building belonging to the plaintiff unless he uses in the construction of it hand-made doors, window frames and window sashes, in place of doors, window frames, and window sashes made by machine. Heretofore it seems to have been assumed that a rule forbidding union members to work on machine-made material in order to get the work of doing it by hand was not a legal combination. See in this connection Oxley Stave Co. v. Coopers' International Union (C. C.) 72 Fed. 695; Hopkins v. Oxley Stave Co. 28 C. C. A. 99, 49 U. S. App. 709, 83 Fed. 912; Minasian v. Osborne, 210 Mass. 250, 253, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 179, 96 N. E. 1036, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 1299. There is more money for masons, carpenters, and plumbers in building a ten-story store than there is in building a store of two stories. If it is legal for musicians to adopt a minimum rule fixing the number of musicians who shall be employed in all the theaters within its jurisdiction, it is hard to see why a minimum rule may not be adopted by the allied trade unions of masons, carpenters, and plumbers, fixing the number of stories of which every store to be erected in the business district is to consist.

That is to say, masons, carpenters, and plumbers may combine to refuse to work on any store less than ten stories in height, even though the owner of the land wishes to erect a store of two stories only, and even though the owner, in his judgment, cannot, without pecuniary loss, erect one having more than two stories. It is no answer to point out that the right of an owner of land to erect a two-story building upon it is an absolute one and what we are concerned with in the case at bar is the plaintiff's limited right to a free flow of labor. But in the case of a minimum rule adopted by a union or combination of unions fixing the number of stories for every store erected in the business district, the absolute right of the owner to erect a store having fewer stories is not interfered with. The minimum rule does not forbid the owner erecting such a store with his own hands or by employing nonunion labor. What such a minimum rule interferes with is not the owner's right to erect the store with fewer stories, but the owner's right to a free flow of labor to erect a store with fewer stories. If such a minimum rule can be legally adopted by a union or a combination of unions it is hard to see why unions or a combination of unions cannot adopt a minimum rule fixing the number of stories in case of any and every building to be erected upon any and every foot of land within the commonwealth. Other illustrations might be put showing the far-reaching consequences of a decision upholding the legality of this minimum rule.

A majority of the court are of opinion that a minimum rule fixing the number of musicians to be employed in the several theaters specified in it is an interference with the right of the owners of those theaters to a free flow of labor which is not justified by the purpose for which it is made.

The defendants have relied upon Scott-Stafford Opera House Co. v. Minneapolis Musicians' Asso. supra, where the court reached a conclusion contrary to that reached by us. But that case was decided upon the ground that what one man may do singly any number of men may agree to do jointly. That is not the law of this commonwealth. Burnham v. Dowd, 217 Mass. 351, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 778, 104 N. E. 841; Pickett v. Walsh, 192 Mass. 572, 6 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067, 116 Am. St. Rep. 272, 78 N. E. 753, 7 Ann. Cas. 638, and cases there collected.

From what has been said it follows that the combination complained of by the plaintiff is an illegal combination, and that injunction should issue as prayed for.

So ordered.

Annotation—Right of labor union to enforce rules as to the minimum number of employees.

For a general reference to notes of interest on the question of the extent to which a labor organization may enforce rules interfering with the rights of an employer of labor, see note to Hitchman Coal & Coke Co. v. Mitchell, ante, 497.

In Scott-Stafford Opera House Co. v. Minneapolis Musicians' Asso. (1912) 118 Minn. 410, 136 N. W. 1092 (referred to in the opinion in HAVERHILL STRAND THEATER v. GILLEN, ante, 813), the court affirmed an order sustaining a demurrer to a complaint in a suit by the theater proprietors to enjoin the enforcement of a rule, adopted by a musicians' association to which practically all musicians available for employment by plaintiffs were members, which prohibited its members from accepting employment or playing in the orchestra of any of the plaintiffs' theaters unless at least a certain number of persons, all members of L.R.A.1918C.

the association, were included in such orchestra. It was further alleged that the number of persons required to make up the orchestra for the different entertainments given by plaintiffs varied with the nature of the entertainment, and that in many entertainments an orchestra made up of less than the number of persons required by such rule would be entirely satisfactory and sufficient, and that a compliance with the rule would be and is a useless and needless burden and expense upon plaintiffs. The holding was based upon the rule that "any man, unless under contract obligation, or unless his employment charges him with some public duty, has a right to refuse to work for or deal with any class of men, as he sees fit, and this right, which one man may exercise singly, any number may agree to exercise jointly." It was pointed out that there was no allegation by the employer of any contractual relation between himself and any of the defendants, or any members of the defendant union. Neither was there any allegation of conspiracy, malice, or ulterior motive, and no question of strike, violence, wage, boycott, or violation of contractual relations or public duty was involved; and no allegation was made that the rule complained of was not beneficial to the members of the defendant corporation. The court said: "The plaintiffs' argument is largely based upon the assumption of lack of benefit to such members; but, in the absence of any allegation of such lack of benefit, we think it may fairly be inferred from the facts and circumstances alleged, and from the very nature of the rule recited, that the rule was designed to benefit the members of the defendant corporation. Certainly the rule does not appear to be so manifestly nonadapted to produce benefit as to raise an inference of malice or evil motive."

The court in the HAVERHILL CASE regards the Minnesota decision as resting upon the ground that what one man may do singly any number of men may agree to do,—a proposition from which the Massachusetts court dissents. The conflict of views upon this fundamental question is reflected in the various notes dealing with industrial disputes which are cited in L.R.A. Indexes under the titles "Conspiracy" and "Labor Organization."

In Grassi Contracting Co. v. Bennett (1916) 174 App. Div. 244, 160 N. Y. Supp. 279, a labor organization was restrained from ordering a strike or otherwise attempting to enforce a rule requiring an employer of members of the union to permit a union foreman to work on each of its jobs. The court said that this threatened action was unlawful, and, in view of other material facts presumably known to officers and members of the union, it constituted prima facie evidence of a conspiracy to injure the plaintiff by preventing it from exercising its constitutional right to continue its business and to hire such employees as it required to perform its contracts, and to have the work performed under its own direction or under the direction and supervision of those selected by it.

GEORGE M. HEATHCOTE, Admr., etc., of Edna G. Heathcote. Deceased.

v.

CURTIS PUBLISHING COMPANY.

Guaranty — editorial guaranty of advertisers.

An editorial publication in a magazine that it guaranteed every advertisement in its columns to be honest and trustworthy, and guaranteed the integrity of its advertising, does not render the publishers liable to a subscriber who, on the faith of the statement, patronizes an advertiser who fails to fill an order according to agreement, in the absence of knowledge of unreliability on the part of such advertiser. For other cases, see Guaranty, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County for determination by the Supreme Judicial Court of an action brought to recover damages for alleged breach of a contract by defendant guaranteeing the integrity of its advertising. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Thibodeau & Ellsworth and George M. Heathcote for plaintiff.

Mr. William D. Turner for defendant.

Carroll, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Since her marriage to the plaintiff in December, 1909, the plaintiff's intestate was a subscriber to the "Saturday Evening Post." In April, 1912, an editorial published by the defendant in that paper, entitled "Concerning the Three of Us," stated in substance that the defendant has for years guaranteed every advertisement in its columns to be honest and trustworthy, and the "publishers guarantee the integrity of its advertising." This publication was read by the intestate, who was then thinking of building a house. Prior to February, 1913, she saw in the "Saturday Evening Post" an advertisement of the North American Construction Company concerning the "Aladdin House and Aladdin System" of partly made houses, and also an advertisement by the construction company entitled "How to Beat the Building Game." Mrs. Heathcote wrote to the construction company, which replied to her letter, and on May 29, 1913, ordered from it "a Marsden Aladdin House" for the sum of $1,464.90.

Note. — As to responsibility of publisher to patrons of advertiser, see annotation following this case, post, 820.

The parts of the house arrived at West Newton soon after July 20, 1913, and were taken to the land of the deceased. There was evidence that no plan was received indicating where the parts could be found, or instructions showing how the work was to be carried on; and that it required a skilled carpenter to construct the house. There was also evidence of deficiency in material; that some of the parts did not fit; that the building material was not as represented; and that in other respects the North American Construction Company failed to carry out its contract. When the construction company learned that some of the flooring was missing, it authorized the plaintiff to purchase it at the expense of the company. In December, 1913, the plaintiff wrote to the company "stating the items that were short," and later, in settlement of the claim, received from it a check for $60, which he refused to accept.

The declaration is in four counts: The first alleges a breach of the contract of the defendant in guaranteeing the "honesty, integrity, and trustworthiness" of its advertisers, to the loss and damage of the plaintiff; the second and third are based upon the implied contract in holding out the defendant's advertisers as trustworthy, and its duty to use proper care "to investigate the truth of said recommendation;" the fourth sets out the defendant's fraud. At the close of the evidence the judge directed a verdict for the defendant and reported the case to this court.

While there was evidence that the North American Construction Company failed to perform its contract with the plaintiff's intestate, there was no evidence that this company was engaged in a fraudulent business, was financially irresponsible, or was in the habit of intentionally deceiving people. The editorial was not strictly a guaranty to answer for the debt or default of another, and it contained no words indicating such an intention; it was in effect merely a recommendation of its advertisers. "The integrity of its advertising and the honesty and trustworthiness of its advertisements," indicates no more than this, that its advertisers can be depended upon as reliable and honest. A statement that a manufacturer is trustworthy is an assurance that he is so reputed,—that nothing to the contrary is known; and while an action may lie upon such a promise in case of fraud, it is not a statement which gives a right of action against the publisher if the party recommended does not do as he agrees under any particular contract. The defendant assured the readers of its publication that its advertisements were honest and trustworthy. It did not guarantee the faithful performance of contracts made by its advertisers, or agree to answer for their debt or default; nor did it promise that in supplying materials for the construction of the house the North American Construction Company would fully and exactly carry out the terms of its agreement with the plaintiff's intestate. See Eaton v. Mayo, 118 Mass. 141.

We find nothing in the evidence to show a breach of the defendant's promise. On the contrary, the defendant, according to its practice, before receiving the advertisement, made a thorough investigation of the North American Construction Company and "the personnel of the company," "their standing. . . . their business and financial ability, and their general reputation." and the results were entirely satisfactory. There is nothing to show that this investigation was not careful and complete, or that it revealed or ought to have revealed anything not in harmony with the statements of its editorial.

There is nothing in the answer of the defendant's president that shows a failure to examine thoroughly the affairs of the construction company. It appears from his answers that the North American Construction Company advertised in the "Saturday Evening Post" during the years 1910, 1911, and 1913, and that the defendant had no knowledge that this company was unreliable or had ever failed to fulfil its contracts. Two or three complaints about the construction company had been made to the defendant, but, with one exception, it did not appear what the reasons were, if any, for these complaints, or on what basis they were settled, if settlements were made. In one case the complaint was from a purchaser of a house who said the siding and flooring were imperfect. He wrote to the North American Construction Company about it several times, but no adjustment was made; he then wrote to the defendant, and although he did not make the purchase because of an advertisement "seen especially in the paper of the defendant," but after a visit to the construction company's factory, the construction company settled the loss and the matter was ended. These complaints did not show that the construction company was dishonest, unreliable, or lacking in integrity, and they are far from showing any neglect on the part of the defendant to investigate properly the North American Construction Company and the standing and reputation of its officers.

There is no evidence that the representations made by the defendant were false. It follows that the verdict was properly directed, and judgment is to be entered for the defendant.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Annotation—Responsibility of publisher to patrons of advertiser.

A novel question, which apparently has not before been passed upon, was involved in HEATHCOTE v. CURTIS PUB. Co. ante, 818, where the court held that an editorial published in a magazine stating that the publishers guaranteed every advertisement in their columns to be honest and trustworthy, and guaranteed the integrity of their advertising, did not render the publishers liable to a subscriber who, on the strength of the statement, patronized an advertiser who failed to fill an order according to agreement, at least in the absence of knowledge by the publishers of unreliability on the part of the advertiser. It will be noted that recovery was sought on a count alleging a breach of the publishers' contract in guaranteeing the honesty and trustworthiness of their advertisers, and also on counts based upon the publishers' implied contract in holding out the advertisers as trustworthy, and their duty to use proper care to investigate the truth of their recommendation, and on another count setting out the defendant's fraud. It appears in this case that the publishers made a thorough investigation of the advertiser and that it was found to be a reputable concern. The conclusion reached is, upon the facts, apparently sound. A state of facts, however, can be conceived of which might warrant a recovery. For example, if it appeared that publishers of a magazine or a newspaper had inserted advertisements of concerns which they knew practised fraud on those dealing with them, and had nevertheless inserted a recommendation of their advertisers, a recovery could doubtless be had against the publishers by defrauded patrons of the advertiser who were induced to deal with the latter by the advertisement and the publishers' recommendation. A closer question as to the publishers' liability would arise in a case where it merely appeared that they inserted advertisements of concerns with knowledge that they were unreliable, but made no special recommendation as to the advertisers' reputation or responsibility.

While not directly in point, the case of De la Bere v. Pearson [1908] 1 K. B. (Eng.) 280, 1 B. R. C. 21, 77 L. J. K. B. N. S. 380, 98 L. T. N. S. 71, 24 Times L. R. 120, is of interest in this connection. In that case, the proprietors of a newspaper having advertised in their paper that their city editor would answer inquiries from readers desiring financial advice, a reader of the paper wrote asking for a safe investment for a stated sum, and for the name of a "good stockbroker." It was held that there was a contract between the proprietors of the paper and the reader by which the former undertook to use reasonable care that a person recommended as a broker should answer the description of a "good broker," and that the act of the defendant's editor in recommending, without making inquiries, a broker who was not a member of the stock exchange and who was an undischarged bankrupt, constituted a breach of the contract, and that a recovery might be had against the proprietors of the paper, the person recommended having misappropriated money sent to him for investment by the reader of the paper. In this case, of course, the advertisement was that of the proprietors, and not that of a third person.

APPEAL by the Public Service Commission from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Cole County setting aside its order requiring that a physical connection be made between two certain telephone companies. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. Z. Patterson and James D. Lindsay, for appellant:

The order of the Public Service Commission requiring the respondent telephone company, at the expense of the mutual telephone company, to construct and maintain a physical connection with the latter company, and to receive and transmit messages or conversations for long-distance transmission originating on its lines, is valid as a reasonable regulation of the business of respondent and its use of its property, is a requirement of service, and is not a "taking" or appropriation of its property.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by the Public Service Commission from a judgment of the circuit court of Cole county setting aside an order of the commission which required that a physical connection be made at the town of Auxvasse, in Callaway county, between the Auxvasse Mutual Telephone Company and the Buffum Telephone Company.

The proceedings before the commission were upon the complaint of the Auxvasse Company asking that the Buffum Company be required to receive and transmit long-distance messages over its lines from the members and subscribers of the Auxvasse Company, that they might thereby have long-distance connection over the lines of the Buffum Company.

The Auxvasse Company is not incorporated, but is a mutual telephone company formed by the union at the town of Auxvasse of various neighborhood lines extending into the town and united in a local exchange. It was organized in 1911, to afford cheap telephone service to its shareholders and subscribers. It consists of about 140 members, owning twelve or more lines running into and connected at a central office and switchboard in the town of Auxvasse. The members on the various lines composing the system furnish and own their respective lines and instruments and keep the same in repair, and the members on each line maintain an organization of their own. The union of the various lines under a constitution and by-laws constitutes the central organization known as the Auxvasse Mutual Telephone Company. The organization owns the poles, wires, and equipment in the town of Auxvasse, and the central office and switchboard whereby all the various lines are united and a local exchange maintained. The maintenance of the central office, and of the upkeep of the property belonging thereto, is borne by receipts for service rendered to certain subscribers at flat rates, who are nonmembers, and from toll charges received from nonmembers talking from phones on the lines of the company to a person on the line of another mutual local company with which the Auxvasse Company maintains free exchange service arrangements. Any deficit is made up by assessment upon the members. There are eight subscribers not members who pay a flat rate or fee of $5 each per annum for service on the exchange and for communications over the various local lines of the company. Any white person may talk free from the phone of a member to a person at a phone on any of the lines of the company, and may talk with a person on the line of any of the other like mutual local companies with which the Auxvasse Company has exchange service arrangements upon payment of a toll charge of 10 cents. The members and subscribers on the various lines receive free service over the lines of the company and over the lines of other like mutual companies with which exchange service arrangements have been made. There are about twenty-five of the latter.

The members and subscribers of the Auxvasse Company also have service over a mutual line owned by the company to Mexico, Missouri, but do not have general long-distance service. The service of the members and subscribers is confined to the lines of the company, the connecting line owned by the members to Mexico, and the lines of other like mutual companies with which free service arrangements have been established.

The Buffum Company is an incorporated company, and has a local exchange in the town of Auxvasse, and, through its own lines and connecting lines of other companies with which it is affiliated, has long-distance service over the country in general. The central offices of the Buffum Company and of the Auxvasse Company are located in the same block near each other.

This action is prompted by a desire of the members of the Auxvasse Company to have from their own phones long-distance connection through the Buffum exchange with the various lines and points reached by the Buffum Company. Connection with Fulton, the county seat of Callaway county, is especially desired.

The commission found that the cost of the physical connection between the two exchanges would not exceed $25, and that the connection desired was not for an interchange of messages between the local exchanges of the two companies, but that messages transmitted by the subscribers of the Auxvasse Company over its lines should be received and transmitted by the Buffum Company over its lines. The commission further found that the matter was within the provisions of the Public Service Act; that the physical connection desired could reasonably be made, and that there would thereby be formed a continuous line of communication between the two companies for the transfer of messages or conversations by persons entitled to use the lines of the Auxvasse Company; that public convenience and necessity would thereby be subserved; whereupon the commission ordered the connection to be made, and that the service asked be furnished by the Buffum Company.

The commission also found that, irrespective of whether the property of the Auxvasse Company was impressed with a public use or not, the nature of its business and the number of persons served by it were such as to create a necessity for the physical connection demanded, and therefore the making of same and the rendering of the service was a duty which could lawfully be required of the Buffum Company.

It was ordered that the expense of making the connection be borne by the Auxvasse Company, and that said company, or its subscribers, or any person using its line for the purpose of long-distance connection with the lines of the Buffum Company, pay to the latter company for such service the full amount of the tolls and charges of the Buffum Company therefor, in accordance with its schedule filed with the commission.

The Buffum Company filed its application for a rehearing, but failed to allege as grounds for same the violations by the commission through its order of provisions of the Constitution of Missouri and of the United States, as subsequently set forth in its petition for review. Upon the overruling of the application for a rehearing the Buffum Company filed its petition for a review in the Cole county circuit court of the action of the commission, setting up the constitutional questions above noted. In the circuit court the respondent herein asked that a jury be called, and that it be permitted to introduce additional testimony. These requests were refused.

Respondent then filed its motion for a judgment reversing the order of the commission, and, among other things, set up that the order was made without due process of law, and was a taking of respondent's property without just compensation, and was a violation of §§ 10, 20, 21, and 30 of article 2 of the Constitution of Missouri, and of § 1 of the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and that the alleged taking of its property was an unauthorized exercise of the right of eminent domain.

The appellant, Public Service Commission, filed its motion to strike out respondent's motion for a judgment, for the reason that same was based upon grounds not urged or relied upon by respondent in its motion for rehearing, and was a violation of the method of procedure provided for by the Public Service Act, under the law of its creation which motion was overruled. The court thereupon sustained respondent's motion, and entered judgment annulling and setting aside the order of the commission.

The judgment of the circuit court sustaining the respondent's motion involves a finding that upon the record the Auxvasse Company was not a public utility operating for hire, and therefore not subject to the jurisdiction of the commission; that public convenience and necessity would not be subserved by the making of the connection, and that no authority existed for the order, and that enforcement of same constituted a taking of respondent's property in the sense and manner forbidden by the Constitution.

A synopsis of the relevant sections of the Public Service Act (Laws 1913, pp. 556-651) will assist in determining the matter at issue. By a "telephone corporation," as the term is employed in the act, is meant: "Every corporation, company, association, joint stock company or association, partnership and person, . . . owning, operating, controlling or managing any telephone line or part of telephone line used in the conduct of the business of affording telephonic communication for hire." Subd. 17, § 2.

The term "telephone line" is defined to include every sort of property "used, operated, controlled or owned by any telephone corporation to facilitate the business of affording telephonic communication." Subd. 18, § 2.

The jurisdiction, supervision, powers, and duties of the commission are declared to extend "to all telephone lines, as above defined, . . . and to every telephone company, . . . so far as said telephone . . . lines are and lie, and so far as said telephone companies . . . conduct . . . line or lines, respectively, within this state." Subd. 6, § 16.

The subjection of telephone corporations L.R.A.1918C.

to the supervision of the commission in respect of facilities and service it shall afford is stated thus: "Every . . . telephone corporation shall furnish and provide with respect to its business such instrumentalities and facilities as shall be adequate and in all respects just and reasonable." § 87.

The duty of each telephone corporation to transmit messages is thus prescribed: "Every . . . telephone corporation operating in this state shall receive, transmit and deliver without discrimination or delay, the conversations and messages of every other . . . telephone corporation with whose line a physical connection may have been made." Subd. 5, § 87.

The provision for requiring physical connections between lines of telephone companies is as follows: "Whenever the commission . . . shall find that a physical connection can reasonably be made between the lines of two or more telephone corporations . . . whose lines can be made to form a continuous line of communication by the construction and maintenance of suitable connections for the transfer of . . . conversations, and that public convenience and necessity will be subserved thereby, or shall find that two or more . . . telephone corporations have failed to establish joint rates, tolls or charges for service by or over their said lines, and that joint rates, tolls or charges ought to be established, the commission may, by its order, require that such connection be made, except where the purpose of such connection is primarily to secure the transmission of local : . . . conversations between points within the same city or town, and the conversations be transmitted . . . over such connection under such rules and regulations as the commission may establish, and prescribe through lines and joint rates, tolls and charges to be made, and to be used, observed and in force in the future. If such . . . telephone corporations do not agree upon the division between them of the cost of such physical connection or connections or the division of the joint rates, tolls or charges established by the commission over such through lines, the commission shall have authority, after further hearing, to establish such division by supplemental order." Subd. 3, § 93.

The powers of the commission, in requiring improvements, changes in, or additions to telephone facilities, are thus further amplified and emphasized: "Whenever the commission shall be of the opinion . . . that repairs or improvements to or changes in any . . . telephone line ought reasonably to be made, or that any additions should reasonably be made thereto, in order to promote the convenience of the public or employees. or in order to secure adequate service or facilities for . . . telephonic communications, the commission shall make and serve an order, directing that such repairs, improvements, changes or additions be made within a reasonable time and in a manner to be specified therein, and every . . . telephone corporation is hereby required and directed to make all repairs, improvements, changes and additions required of it by any order of the commission served upon it." § 95.

All of these provisions are to be liberally construed as required by the act, to wit: "The provisions of this act shall be liberally construed with a view to the public welfare, efficient facilities and substantial justice between patrons and public utilities," § 127.

I. If the companies here involved are public utilities within the meaning of the Public Service Act, and a physical connection between them will add to their efficiency as such, then the judgment of the circuit court should be reversed, and the order of the commission affirmed; otherwise not. If it were not conceded by the Buffum Company that it is a public utility, and as such subject to the supervision of the commission, the nature of its organization and the character of its activities would justify no other conclusion. It remains, therefore, to be determined whether the Auxvasse Company is subject to a like classification. To render it so it is not necessary that it be incorporated. Under the inclusive provisions of subdivision 17 of § 2, supra, any association, joint stock company, partnership, or person dependent primarily upon the character of the telephone business it conducts may be so classified.

The Auxvasse Company is a voluntary association. The right to the use of the facilities it affords is limited to white persons who are the owners of certificates of shares therein, for which they are required to pay a fixed sum. In addition an assessment is made upon such shareholders of $1.50 each per quarter to maintain and operate a central office or switchboard. Maintenance charges required of each shareholder may be fixed quarterly. Shareholders are not required to pay more than is actually necessary for the upkeep and operating expenses for the quarter ensuing the fixing of same. Nonsubscribers are not charged for talking from any telephone on the Auxvasse switchboard to any other telephone on the same switchboard; but when talking from a telephone on the Auxvasse switchboard to one on a connecting switchboard, they are required to pay a fee of 10 cents to the owner of the telephone where the call is made. Fees thus collected are required to be paid into the company's treasury during the J. R. A. 1918C.

quarter when they are collected. This constitutes the extent of the business and income of the Auxvasse Company, except $5 per year paid by each of eight flat rate subscribers, who are thus entitled to the facilities afforded without further charge. An abstract of the testimony of a number of the shareholders of this company given at the hearing before the commission will give a definite idea as to the character of the business of the company, from which its nature and purpose may be determined. These are literal excerpts from different witnesses' testimony in response to inquiries propounded to them on the stand:

"To maintain and operate the central office each party contributes $1.50 per quarter."—E. W. Martin.

"The lines are kept up by the members who own them. This keeping up of the lines applies to residents in the town of Auxvasse and the surrounding country."—S. W. Turner.

"It was never the intention of the company to go into the telephone business for profit. No; I don't think they calculated on more than enough to make expenses. It was not the intention to go into what is known as a commercial business. The lines were built for convenience. That's what a telephone is for."—J. F. Buckner.

"The company is not in the telephone business to make money out of it. It was simply for the accommodation of the shareholders. The Mexico toll line is kept up out of the treasury of the company. I use it three or four times a day, I reckon, but I pay no toll charges for this use. The toll line is used a whole lot. Country people, when they come in, use it more than we do in town. We keep it up for the benefit of those who want to use it."—W. F. Woodson.

"On the Auxvasse line each individual owns the box he uses, and the association owns the telephone line reaching to the switchboard. The association does not build lines to anybody. It is simply a collection of individuals divided further into lines and each line is a separate organization in that it owns its own line. The Auxvasse Company is not a corporation; it is simply a voluntary association composed of individuals. Its purpose is to provide telephone service to its stockholders at actual cost. No service is furnished in town to anybody except stockholders."—S. M. Turner.

The constitution and by-laws and the oral testimony all point to the conclusion that the Auxvasse Company is primarily a private organization not operated for hire. Operation for hire is a prerequisite to supervision by the commission. The reason is plain. The commission was created, as is evident from the entire statute defining its powers, not to interfere with individual action except where same assumes a public nature, but to provide regulations and give plenary power, as defined by the statute, to the commission to control such utilities as from their nature and operations may affect the interests of the general public. All such organizations are commercial in their nature in that they are not conducted for favors, but for fees. Recognizing this fact, the framers of the Public Service Act made this a condition precedent to commission control. That a fee may be exacted from nonsubscribers for talking from a telephone on the company's switchboard to one on a connecting line does not militate against the correctness of the conclusion that this company does not afford telephonic communications for hire. If thus conducted, the right of nonsubscribers to demand service would be absolute upon the tender of the fee. Such a right cannot exist, however, because the telephones are individually owned by those in whose premises they are located, and, no limitation as to such ownership having been made by the company, if such could be made under the circumstances, the right of use to nonsubscribers is at best permissive, and, being so, does not authorize the conclusion that the company is conducted for hire. The fee thus authorized to be charged is but an incident in the general conduct of the business of the company, and is not indicative of its character, which is to serve those who sustain it, and not the general public. Nor is the claim that the eight subscribers, in the absence of any authority therefor in the company's constitution and by-laws, are permitted upon the payment of a flat rate, free from assessments, to enjoy its facilities, an argument in favor of the contention that the company is conducting its business for hire. Each of these subscribers owns the phone used by him. Except, therefore, for the difference between the payments made by them and others, they sustain no different relation to the company. If their relation be construed to give color to the contention that these transactions are of a commercial nature, and hence the company is conducting its business for hire, it will be sufficient to say that the constitution and by-laws based thereon confer no such authority upon the company as is thus exercised. The elementary axiom is therefore applicable that the company cannot enlarge its character by exceeding its powers.

The settlement of a controverted question is often rendered easier by a resort to essentials. To that end, what is meant by such companies as "conduct telephonic communications for hire?" Simply those which engage in business as a commercial transaction, or for profit. Summarizing what we L.R.A.1918C.

have heretofore said, is this company of that class? It lets nothing; it hires nothing; but for the maintenance of its own property, and for that alone, it exacts a like sum quarterly from all of its members. The accessories, to wit, the telephone boxes necessary to render the lines available for the transmission of conversations, do not belong to the company, but to the individual members. Hence the property owned by the company is but inconsiderable, and there is in existence no such organization as is contemplated by the statute.

The Public Service Act is further illuminative of the character of telephone companies subject to its provisions, in defining the requirements that may be made of them. The commission may require them to furnish and provide such instrumentalities as shall be adequate in all respects for the transacting of their business (§ 87); to transmit and deliver without discrimination or delay conversations sent over other lines with which they have physical connection (subd. 5, § 87); to make physical connections with other like companies (subd. 3, § 93); to order repairs, improvements, and changes in companies for the betterment of the service (§ 95). In addition they may be required to file schedules of their rates of charges with the commission and subject themselves to its supervision by complying with its rules and regulations for the operation of telephone companies. There is no pretense that in any of these particulars this company has complied with these statutes. On the contrary, it is not contended that it could be required so to do. Unless there is other evidence than is disclosed by the record, we are inclined to the opinion that it could not be so required. Rulings upon kindred questions in other jurisdictions are but a little more than persuasive in the determination of the matter here at issue on account of differences in the statutes construed. Rightly reasoned, this well-marked line runs through them all, that to authorize supervision the character of the utility must be of such a nature that the exercise of its powers will affect public rather than private rights. Any other classification would destroy the ruling purpose underlying the creation of Public Service Commissions, and necessarily, sooner or later, run afoul of constitutional provisions, the violation of which would be inimical to individual liberty of action.

II. The same facts adduced to show that the Auxvasse Company is not a public utility will sustain the conclusion that its connection with the Buffum Company is not such a matter of public necessity and convenience as to authorize the issuance of an order in regard thereto. Recapitulated, these are the nature of its business, existing as it does, not for public use, but private convenience; its requiring no pay for profit, but fees only for the purpose of existence. Need arguments be piled up like Pelion on Ossa to establish the fact that facilities added by the commissioner's order to an association of this type will not enable it to pass beyond its own tether and add even incidentally to the convenience of others than its own membership? We think not.

The constitutional question injected into this controversy for the first time in the petition for review was not timely. How, without a contradiction in terms, can a matter be reviewed which has not been viewed? The purpose of the petition filed in the circuit court, in cases of this character, would be defeated if new issues were permitted to be incorporated therein. Forms of procedure are for the purpose of facilitating business, whether it be of a court or a commission; and there is no more reason why, when required by law, they should not be observed in one case than in the other. By the express language of § 110 of the Public Service Act (Laws 1913, p. 641), it is provided that "no corporation or person or public utility shall in any court urge or rely on any ground not so set forth in said application," referring to that of rehearing. We ruled in State ex rel. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Atkinson, 269 Mo. 634, L.R.A.1918A, 46, P.U.R.1917C, 971, 192 S. W. 86, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 987, that the observance of this rule was obligatory. There is no reason for a variance from this conclusion. Neither within the letter or spirit of the Public Service Act is the character of the Auxvasse Company such as to render it subject to the commission, and hence the latter is not authorized to comply with the demand herein made.

The contention is vaguely made by appellant that the individual members of this company have collectively the right to demand the connection here under consideration. This contention is evidently based upon the assumption that numbers alone will establish the claim of public necessity. This is not true. Their mere numbers give them no more rights in the premises than a single individual would have under like circumstances. If A should demand that his private phone be connected with the Buffum Company, we may look in vain for authority in reason or the law for the exercise of such power by the commission as will effect a compliance with this request. Granted to A, the right must, as a necessary consequence, be conceded to every other individual owning a private telephone line. The result would be the improper invasion of the rights granted by law to the Buffum Company, or, in other words, the taking of its property without due process of law. A, therefore, is entitled to the same service as others, but not more, and he will only be heard to complain when such service is denied. This subject was discussed incidentally with much clearness in Home Teleph. Co. v. Sarcoxie Light & Teleph. Co. 236 Mo. loc. cit. 133, 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 124, 139 S. W. 108, in which the conclusion we have indicated was reached.

There is, in our opinion, no sufficient ground for the order of the commission requiring a connection to be made between the Buffum and the Auxvasse Companies, and the judgment of the Circuit Court is therefore affirmed.

All concur, except Blair, J., who dissents.

Annotation—Mutual telephone companies as public utilities.

Whether or not a mutual telephone company constitutes a public utility so as to be subject to the jurisdiction of the Public Service Commission is a question upon which there is an apparent conflict of decision. It should be observed, however, that the statutes differ in respect to the definitions of "public utilities." In some of the cases the point for decision upon which the case turned was whether the company was operating for "public use" or furnishing service "for the public;" whether the company was "doing a telephone business;" or whether the company was operating "for profit," "for compensation," or "for hire." The decision upon this L.R.A.1918C.

question also depends largely upon the particular facts and circumstances in each case.

Operating for "public use" or furnishing service for "the public."

Generally, it is held that a company furnishing telephone service for the use of its members only is not a public utility, under a statute prescribing as the test of the operation of its property "for public use."

Thus, a mutual telephone company furnishing telephone service for use of its members only, for communication between themselves, and without pecuniary profit, does not operate its property "for public use," so as to become a pub-lie utility within the Illinois Public Utilities Act, necessitating the securing of a certificate of convenience and necessity from the commission before constructing a plant in territory served by another public utility. State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Macon County Teleph. Co. v. Bethany Mut. Teleph. Asso. (1915) 270 Ill. 183, P.U.R.1916A, 997, 110 N. E. 334, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 495. The court said: "To constitute a public use, all persons must have an equal right to the use, and it must be in common, upon the same terms, however few the number who avail themselves of it. It is not essential to a public use that its benefits should be received by the whole public, or even a large part of it, but they must not be confined to specified, privileged persons. People ex rel. Scott v. Ricketts (1911) 248 Ill. 428, 94 N. E. 71. The words, "public use" mean of or belonging to the people at large, open to all the people to the extent that its capacity may admit of the public use. State Public Utilities Commission v. Monarch Refrigerating Co. (1915) 267 Ill. 528, P.U.R.1915D, 119, 108 N. E. 716, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 528. The use must concern the public as distinguished from an individual, or any particular number of individuals, but the use and enjoyment of the utility need not extend to the whole public or any political subdivision. It may be confined to a particular district and still be public. State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Noble Teleph. Co. v. Noble Mut. Teleph. Co. (1915) 268 Ill. 411, P.U.R.1915D, 770, 109 N. E. 298, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 897. . . . By the charter the use of the telephone system is limited strictly and solely to the members of the corporation, and it has no authority, under its charter, to erect or maintain any telephone line for the service of the public. It can only exercise such powers as are within the scope of its charter, and none others. . . . It is argued that the appellant's property is used or to be used for a public use, because the appellant has obtained a license from the village of Bethany to construct, maintain, and operate telephone poles, wires, and fixtures in the streets of the village, and has purchased a great quantity of poles which it intends to erect on the public highways and to string wires on them. These matters neither concern the petitioner nor the State Public Utilities Commission, and do not fix the character of the corporation. If poles or wires should be placed on streets and highways, it would no more tend to prove L.R.A.1918C.

that the use is public than the fact of farmers driving upon the public highways with their own products would tend to prove they are common carriers. If constructing a telephone system in streets or highways for private use is a diversion of the streets or highways from their legitimate use, the commission would not thereby acquire jurisdiction over the appellant."

So an association chartered to maintain a telephone system for the private use of its members is not a public utility, and does not become one, so as to necessitate the securing of a certificate of convenience and necessity from the Public Utilities Commission before operating in territory served by a public utility, under a statute confining the jurisdiction of the commission to the control and supervision of owners and operators of property devoted to "public use," by the acceptance of a municipal franchise authorizing it to use the public streets, or by the violation of its charter in rendering service to the public. State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Evansville Teleph. Co. v. Okaw Valley Mut. Teleph. Asso. (1918) 282 Ill. 336, P.U.R.1918C, 583, 118 N. E. 760. The court pointed out that the telephone association could only exercise the rights and powers granted by its charter, and would be subject to a penalty and to a forfeiture of its franchise if it should assume to act or to serve the public generally as a telephone company organized and chartered to serve the public for hire; that the Public Utilities Commission is given no right or power to extend the charter rights and powers of the association to enable it to obtain a certificate of convenience and necessity, or to give it the right and power to do a telephone business as a public utility; and that violations of its charter could not have the effect to make it a public utility.

And a mutual telephone company which furnishes service to its members only does not operate a telephone system or plant for "public use," so as to be a public utility within the meaning of the New Jersey act, Laws of 1911, chap. 195. Re Farmers' Mut. Teleph. Co. (1913) 1 Ann. Rep. N. J. P. U. C. 74, P.U.R.1915C, 344 (abstract).

Likewise, farm telephone lines built and maintained by the owners for the purpose of securing service through connections with a city system, whose owners do not own or operate an exchange, or rent telephones to the public, or hold themselves out as conducting or operating a public system, are not public utilities under Illinois Public Utilities Act, and therefore may disconnect from the city system without the consent of the commission. Thompson v. Kleckner (1915; Ill.) P.U.R.1916A, 153.

But where the service is open to all who desire to become members of the company, or the system is so operated through connections or otherwise as to afford communication by and with persons not members, it has been held that the company is a public utility.

Thus, a mutual telephone company, the service of which is open to anyone within its territory willing to become a shareholder, such shareholders having the means of communicating over the company's lines with one another, and also via commercial lines with various cities and villages of the state, operates its property "for public use," and is a public utility within the meaning of § 10 of the Illinois Public Utilities Act, and therefore required to have a certificate of convenience and necessity. State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Pike County Teleph. Co. v. Noble (1916) 275 Ill. 121, P.U.R.1917A, 520, 113 N. E. 910, affirming order of Public Utilities Commission. For opinion of the commission, see (1915) P.U.R.1915C, 336. The Illinois supreme court said: "The question whether a person or persons, association, copartnership, or company is owning, operating, or controlling a public utility is one that necessarily depends upon the special facts connected with the management, operation, or control of such business. A mutual telephone company may or may not be operating and managing a public utility, but when it is operating its line in connection with the exchange of a commercial telephone company, and serving the public in the manner that, as shown here, appellants' lines are serving the public, there can be no escape from the conclusion that the business is a public utility, and is subject to the control of the Public Utilities Commission of this state."

And a mutual telephone company rendering service to its members at cost, and having connection with other telephone companies upon the basis of a mutual exchange of free service, operates and manages its plant "for a public use," so as to make it a public utility within § 10 of the Illinois Public Utilities Act, and to necessitate the securing of a certificate of convenience and necessity from the commission under § 55 of the act before beginning operations in territory served by another company, where its franchise to use the streets of the village in which it is located is given upon express condition that no person, firm, or corporation except commercial telephone companies shall be barred from membership and from the service to be rendered by the company; and it is immaterial that the company does not furnish as complete service as is supplied by most commercial companies. State Public Utilities Commission ex rel. Noble Teleph. Co. v. Noble Mut. Teleph. Co. (1915) 268 Ill. 411, P.U.R.1915D, 770, 109 N. E. 298, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 897.

Likewise, a mutual telephone copartnership serving thirty-seven subscribers by rural lines connected with the exchange of another company, by virtue of which its subscribers are able to communicate not only among themselves, but with all subscribers connected with the exchange, and have access to the long-distance service of the company, is a "telephone company" "furnishing telephone service to the public," subject to the jurisdiction of the commission, and as such may be required to re-establish telephone service to a subscriber that has been discontinued. Sullwold v. Four Lakes Rural Teleph. Co. (1917; Minn.) P.U.R.1918B, 147.

And under a statute defining a public utility as embracing every corporation, association, or individual operating any plant for the conveyance of telephone messages, either directly or indirectly, "to or for the public," the Wisconsin Commission held in Re Five Mile Creek Teleph. Co. (1917; Wis.) P.U.R. 1918B, 526 (abstract), that a farmer telephone line occupying the public highway and connecting with the exchange of a telephone company is a public telephone utility, and should not arbitrarily discontinue service on account of a dispute between the owners of the line. The commission said: "It may well be that the occupancy of the highways alone makes the use a public one, since our statutes nowhere permit the public highways to be occupied for any but public uses. Being engaged in furnishing local service in that territory, the company would doubtless be entitled to notice under chap. 610 of the Laws of 1913 before a paralleling line could be constructed there. To the extent indicated, then, the respondent is a public telephone utility and so bound to furnish service to all who apply, within reasonable territorial limits and in accordance with approved rules. Since the company is, in contemplation of law, a partnership, it may be doubtful if this commission can dictate who the members of the firm shall be. But as a utility the co-partnership can be required to render service on a commercial basis to any person who desires it, within its territorial limits."

"Doing a telephone business."

It has been held that the furnishing of telephone service by a mutual company is "doing a telephone business."

Thus, in Reading Cent. Teleph. Co. v. Fayette Rural Teleph. Co. (1915; Mich.) P.U.R.1915A, 56, the Michigan Railroad Commission decided that a mutual telephone company was "doing a telephone business" within the meaning of the statute conferring jurisdiction over all persons, corporations, and associations operating telephone lines or exchanges doing a telephone business, and required the company to furnish an interchange of telephone communication and service by means of lines and circuits already forming a physical connection between the exchange and that of another company. The commission pointed out that the phrase "doing a telephone business" excludes only such facilities as are entirely private in character, and that an association having its poles and wires upon the public highways, and furnishing communication between its immediate patrons and with those of distant organizations, cannot be said to be a private facility not doing a telephone business, merely because the cost of its maintenance was apportioned in the form of an assessment.

And in Canterbury & B. Teleph. Co. (1912) 2 Ann. Rep. N. H. P. S. C. 76, P.U.R.1915C, 345 (abstract), the New Hampshire Commission held that a telephone company was doing a telephone business in a certain city so as not to require the consent of the commission to extend its service, where it was engaged in transmitting messages for compensation in the territory in question, although it held no franchise from the city.

Operating "for profit."

By the Ohio statute utilities "not operating for profit" are expressly excluded from control and supervision by the commission.

Accordingly, in Wehr v. Seneca Valley Teleph. Co. (1916; Ohio) P.U.R.1916E, 479, the Ohio Public Utilities Commission held that it had no jurisdiction of a complaint against a mutual telephone company "not operated for profit," requesting an order requiring restoration of service which had been withdrawn, and alleging discriminatory practices and excessive rates.

The provision of the same statute, however, to the effect that "no telephone company" shall furnish service in territory adequately served by an existing company without consent of the commission, has been held applicable to mutual telephone companies "not operated for profit," by the Ohio supreme court in Ashley Tri-County Mut. Teleph. Co. v. New Ashley Teleph. Co. (1915) 92 Ohio St. 336, P.U.R.1916B, 401, 110 N. E. 959, although the court remarked that a mutual telephone company not operated for profit is not a public utility within the statutory definition of public utilities, which expressly excludes utilities not "operating for profit." The court, in referring to this provision (§ 614-52, General Code), said: "The legislature specifically treated telephone companies as public utilities requiring special legislation. Telephone companies were thereby taken from the general scheme of public utility regulation, and there was added and applied to this particular utility a statutory mandate not applicable to others. Having in view the public convenience primarily, and the adequacy of telephone service secondarily, it protected the public convenience, and incidentally the established plant, by a special provision that no telephone company should invade a municipality or locality furnishing adequate service without a certificate from the commission; and this the statute provides irrespective of whether the company operates for profit or not. The legislature, no doubt, considered that public policy required special legislation in that particular field when it sought to supervise competition in the interest of public convenience. The language of the section is plain, and we are unable to apply to telephone companies the added words, 'operating their utilities for profit.'"

We do not hold that private telephone lines, or that even all mutual lines, shall in all cases require the certificate named. Public convenience is the polestar of the act, and an established and adequate service in a municipality or locality is the chief factor in its determination, and where, as here, these factors may be disturbed by a new and competitive telephone company substantially affecting established service, it is necessary that a certificate be obtained to the effect that the right or franchise is necessary for the public convenience, before such second company can exercise its rights and franchises in such occupied locality."

Operating "for compensation."

It has been held that a mutual company furnishing telephone service to its members without profit is engaged in a public service "for compensation" so as to be a public utility.

Thus, in Mountain States Teleph. & Teleg. Co. v. Project Mut. Teleph. & Electric Co. (1916; Idaho) P.U.R.1916F, 370, it was held that a mutual telephone company having a large number of subscribers, who paid an amount sufficient to cover the cost of operation and maintenance, was engaged in a public service "for compensation" so as to be a public utility, which cannot operate in territory served by another public utility without securing a certificate of convenience and necessity from the commission, although the service was furnished to stockholders exclusively and without profit. The commission said: "The defendant admits that the complainant has a right to the exclusive privilege of operating a public telephone for compensation within the village of Rupert until such time as this commission shall issue its certificate of necessity and convenience to another company to operate a public telephone line for compensation within the said village, but contends that the defendant is not doing business for compensation. The Century Dictionary defines compensation as 'that which is given or received as an equivalent, as for services, debt, work, loss, or suffering.' It is admitted that the defendant contemplates the operation of a telephone line in the village of Rupert at cost and on a nonprofit-sharing basis. The subscribers of the defendant company pay to the defendant in exchange or as an equivalent for telephone service an amount sufficient to cover the cost of operating and maintaining the plant; and, as we view the situation, the defendant is clearly rendering services for compensation. This construction of the statute we believe to be in the light of the public good or welfare, so as to give effect to the statute as a whole, and to carry out the general policy laid down by the statute and the evident intent of the legislature in enacting the statute."

... It being the prime purpose of the Public Utilities Act to substitute regulation for competition, and to protect the public on the one hand, and the investor on the other, it appears to this commission that the object and whole policy of the statute would be defeated by permitting competition to the extent contemplated by the defendant under the guise of a mutual organization."

Operating "for hire."

It has been held that a mutual company furnishing telephone service without profit is not operating its system "for hire" so as to be a public utility subject to the jurisdiction of the commission.

Thus, a voluntary association furnishing telephone service to its members on the basis of the actual cost of upkeep and operating expense, and as a private convenience to a few nonmembers, the members owning their own instruments, and paying a flat rate, and the non-subscribers paying a toll charge when service is given over connecting lines, is not operated "for hire" so as to make it a public utility within the meaning of the Missouri Public Service Act, and cannot require connection with an incorporated company for long-distance service through the Public Service Commission, which has jurisdiction of telephone companies furnishing service for hire, where the collection of fees from nonmembers is merely an incident in the general conduct of the business. STATE EX REL. BUFFUM TELEPH. CO. v. PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION, ante, 820, which affirmed a judgment setting aside the order of the commission requiring a physical connection. For opinion of commission, see (1916) 3 Mo. P. S. C. 559, P.U.R.1916E, 296.

And a mutual telephone company is not engaged in "the conduct of the business of affording telephonic communication for hire," so as to be subject to the jurisdiction of the commission and required to secure authority for extending its lines, merely because nonsubscribers, who are permitted to use the line without charge as a benefit to subscribers, occasionally "tip" the operators, no portion of such "tip" or of any other payment by nonscribers going to the company. Farmers' Teleph. Co. v. Saline Mut. Teleph. Co. (1917; Mo.) P.U.R.1917C, 881.

In referring to a constitutional provision conferring upon the Oklahoma Corporation Commission jurisdiction over telephone lines "operated for hire," in the case of Twin Valley Teleph. Co. v. Mitchell (1910) 27 Okla. 388, 38 L.R.A. (N.S.) 235, 113 Pac. 914, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 582, the Oklahoma supreme court said: "Only telephone lines 'operated for hire' are placed by article 9 of the Constitution under the jurisdiction of the Corporation Commission. Rural or farmers' lines operated on the mutual plan, without any charges or toll for use of the line, are not subject to regulation by the commission."

"Telephone corporation" or "company."

In Farmers' Mut. Teleph. Co. v. Kinloch Long Distance Teleph. Co. (1916; Mo.) P.U.R.1917A, 245, the Missouri Public Service Commission decided that a mutual telephone company not operating its line "for hire" was not a "telephone corporation" as defined in § 2, subsec. 17, of the Public Service Commission Law, and could not require physical connection with a telephone corporation for long-distance service through the commission under § 93, sub-

sec. 3, of the same statute, authorizing the commission to require physical connection between telephone corporations.

A mutual telephone association operated on an assessment plan is a "telephone company" within the meaning of the South Dakota statute defining the term "telephone company" as embracing all corporations (except municipal), associations, and individuals owning or operating any telephone line or exchange in the state, and requiring telephone companies to establish and file with the Board of Railroad Commissioners a schedule of rates for service before transacting any business. v.

(— W. Va. —, 94 S. E. 954.)

Bond — validity — unconstitutional statute.

1. A bond executed according to the requirements of a statute afterwards declared unconstitutional is not necessarily void. The test of the enforceability of such an instrument, if it has the essentials of a common-law obligation, is whether it is based upon a consideration independent of the statute, or some profit or advantage has accrued to the obligors from its execution which otherwise they would not have received.

For other cases, see Bonds, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — action for breach.

2. But where there was no such consideration, and no such profit or advantage has accrued, the obligation, though in proper form, will not support an action to recover for a breach of its conditions.

and special plea in an action on a statutory bond executed in a proceeding to contest title to office. Case remanded.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. George J. McComas for plaintiff.

Messrs. Strickling & Strickling and J. W. Perry for defendants.

Lynch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

As a candidate for the office of sheriff of Cabell county in the general election held November 7, 1916, for the term beginning January 1, 1917, H. E. Love, on the face of the returns as canvassed by the proper body, was declared elected and entered upon the discharge of his official duties. H. L. McCoy and others, voters and taxpayers of the county, filed their petition in the manner and for the purposes apparently authorized by § 8b (15), chap. 5, Code 1916, charging that by corrupt practices, in violation of the provisions of that act, Love so far influenced the result of the election as to secure title to the office, and entered into the bond upon the conditions required by that section. After the decision of this court in Sutherland v. Miller, — W. Va. —, L.R.A.1917D, 1040, 91 S. E. 993, holding the section invalid as an unlawful delegation of legislative power and for other reasons stated in the opinion, McCoy and others voluntarily dismissed the petition; and this action on the bond ensued to recover the costs and expenses incurred by Love in his defense against the assault so made upon his title to the office he was elected to administer.

Two questions are certified to this court, pursuant to the provisions of the last paragraph of § 1, chap. 135, Code,—the sufficiency of the declaration challenged by demurrer, and of a special plea tendered by defendants and filed by the court over the protest and objection of the plaintiff. As the demurrer and objection in effect raise the same issue, the determination of either one will dispose of the case finally here as now presented.

There is no necessity for reviewing or restating and applying the principles enunciated in Sutherland v. Miller, as no question is raised as to them. On the contrary, they are recognized as controlling upon the questions presented by the petition charging corrupt practices. The controversy requires the determination of a single inquiry, namely, whether a bond voluntarily executed, in conformity with the requirement of a statute subsequently adjusted to be invalid as in contravention of the fundamental or organic law, can serve as the basis of an action to recover damages for the breach of the obligation. As a further limitation upon the scope and extent of the inquiry, it may be said that its solution depends not wholly upon the constitutional incompetency of the act, for, though it thereafter be declared void, the discharge of the obligors from liability does not necessarily follow as a matter of course. While the failure of an act to stand the test of constitutionality does frequently render invalid a bond given pursuant to its requirements, and relieve the obligors from the liability it would impose if the statute were not void, yet if there be some consideration underlying it independent of the statute, or there accrues to them some benefit, advantage, or profit by its execution, they will be required to respond to the undertaking expressed in the instrument. It is not the policy of the law to permit escape from the legal consequences of the execution of such an instrument, if some one or more of the persons who bind themselves to perform its conditions receive and enjoy its fruits or the protection it affords, or derive some material or financial benefit from it. They will not, in either such event, when summoned to account for a breach of the conditions, be permitted to plead the voidness of the statute necessitating the execution of the undertaking.

The decision cited on behalf of plaintiff recognize this distinction. For in Daniels v. Tearney, 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187, it was held: The obligors in a bond given under an unconstitutional law of the Confederate government, which authorizes an execution debtor to give such bond to suspend the sale of property until the operation of the law ceased, were estopped from asserting the unconstitutionality of the law. They availed themselves of its benefits and must not be permitted to escape its responsibilities.

The benefits which in that case effected an estoppel resulted from the deferred enforcement of the judgment, in consequence of the bond sanctioned by an act declared to be void because violative of the constitutional provision against the impairment of contracts. The same qualification appears in Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Vanderwarker, 19 W. Va. 265, a proceeding upon a motion to quash an execution upon a decree against the railroad, where the contention was that, as the bond to supersede the decree pending an appeal was executed only in the name of the appellant's attorney, without surety and without the consent of the company, the instrument did not operate as a supersedeas, wherefore the appellees could have sued out execution on the decree at any time within the period fixed by statute and, having failed to do so, the decree was barred. This court answered that proposition by saying: "If a party has enjoyed the benefit of a supersedeas bond, though it was executed by his attorney . . . alone, when the law required it to be executed with security, in a proceeding to enforce the debt, after the appeal had been dismissed, he is estopped from alleging that the supersedeas bond was invalid."

Most of the cases cited by counsel and examined upon this investigation point out this demarcation between liability and exemption, where the bonds were given under the authority of void legislative enactments, and none of them more clearly and logically than Stevenson v. Morgan, 67 Neb. 207, 108 Am. St. Rep. 629, 93 N. W. 180. It matters not that some of these cases declined to relieve the obligors from liability, because, as found therein, they had derived some substantial benefit, advantage, or protection from the instruments. In Stevenson v. Morgan, the principal obligor had continued temporarily in the possession and enjoyment of the premises from which plaintiff sought to oust him. While emphasizing the qualification of the rule of liability, other cases deny the right to a recovery upon bonds where no such emoluments or benefits accrued. 9 C. J. 28; 4 R. C. L. 55.

It is this point of divergence between the two classes of authority which should be kept constantly in mind in determining the results of the conflicting contentions of the parties to this controversy. For if none of the defendants has received any substantial aid, profit, or advantage by or through the instrument it cannot serve as the foundation of an action to recover the penalty. Wherein such beneficial results inured to them is not pointed out by counsel, and none is perceived. McCoy and his co-obligors have not profited by the obligation they assumed. It did not in the least improve their condition or situation. The proceeding instigated by them proved wholly abortive; and, when the act whose provisions they invoked broke down, the bond fell with it. The law will inject into it substance and entity, so as to charge the obligors, only where some consideration independent of the statute entered into the purposes for which it was executed, or they have reaped some advantage from it for which they should be compelled to respond to the obligee.

There is no real merit in the objection urged against the right claimed by defendants to rely upon legislative incompetency to enact the section under which the petition was filed and the bond executed. This question, so far as anything appears to the contrary, may have been raised by the demurrer to the declaration,—a method of procedure approved in Hoxie v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 82 Conn. 352, 73 Atl. 754, 17 Ann. Cas. 324, 21 Am. Neg. Rep. 42, and Adkins v. Richmond, 98 Va. 91, 47 L.R.A. 583, 81 Am. St. Rep. 705, 34 S. E. 967, whether the obnoxious character of the act is pointed out specifically or not. Besides, the recitals of the bond itself and the averments of the special plea bring the case within the scope and purview of the act. Turpin v. Lemon, 187 U. S. 51, 47 L. ed. 70, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 20; Standard Stock Food Co. v. Wright, 225 U. S. 540, 56 L. ed. 1197, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 784. Furthermore, it is evident the proceeding upon the petition terminated upon the theory that the act is void,—a theory to which counsel address their arguments.

As the Circuit Court did not err in permitting the special plea to be filed, we approve its action, and remand the case.

Annotation—Validity and effect of indemnity bond executed under unconstitutional statute.

A bond executed under an unconstitutional statute may be enforced if it was voluntarily given, is based upon an independent consideration, and contravenes no principle of public policy. In such a case the obligor will be estopped to question the validity of the statute. The leading case on the subject is Daniels v. Tearney (1880) 102 U. S. 415, 26 L. ed. 187, which is sufficiently referred to in Love v. McCoy, ante, 832.

Thus, the obligors in an attachment bond given in a proceeding taken under an unconstitutional statute, who, by means of the bond, obtained possession of the defendant's property, cannot escape responsibility on the bond on account of the unconstitutionality of the statute. State ex rel. Cantwell v. Stark (1882) 75 Mo. 566.

Recovery is permissible on a bond given on an appeal from a justice of the peace in a forcible entry and detention proceeding, though the statute authorizing such bond is afterward declared unconstitutional, provided the obligor has been thereby enabled to retain possession of the premises. Stevenson v. Morgan (1903) 67 Neb. 207, 108 Am. St. Rep. 629, 93 N. W. 180; McVey v. Peddie (1903) 69 Neb. 525, 96 N. W. 166; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Ettenheimer (1904) 70 Neb. 144, 113 Am. St. Rep. 783, 97 N. W. 227, 99 N. W. 652. In the Stevenson Case the court said: "The basis of distinction between these two lines of cases is the consideration. If it exists, the instrument may be enforced like any other contract, and the annulment of, or departure from, a statute providing for it, is not fatal. If, on the other hand, the consideration is absent, the instrument, like any other nudum pactum, affords no basis for recovery."

In Shaughnessy v. American Surety Co. (1903) 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, it was held that a bond was void which stated on its face that it was given in compliance with a statute afterwards found to be unconstitutional, which directed that the owner of property in certain cases should file a bond, and that any laborer or materialman should have an action to recover upon it for the value of labor and materials, etc. The court said: "This bond was given to secure a statutory privilege upon conditions to its enjoyment imposed by the statute, but the privilege was a constitutional privilege, which could not be interfered with by statute. The undertaking was therefore wholly without consideration and void." The court stated further that it was contended that the bond might be considered as a voluntary common-law bond, given without any reference to the statute, but that whether in any case it could be supposed that a sane man, not fearing the compulsion of the statute, would voluntarily give such bond, was a question not presented, as it was expressly stated on the face of the bond that it was given in compliance with the statute.

The same was held in Martin v. McCabe (1913) 21 Cal. App. 658, 132 Pac. 606; and the Shaughnessy Case seems also to have been followed in Hampton v. Christensen (1906) 148 Cal. 729, 84 Pac. 200.

The same was held although the bond did not refer to this statute in terms, where it was apparent that the bond was executed because of it. San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Bibb (1903) 139 Cal. 192, 72 Pac. 964; San Francisco Lumber Co. v. Bibb (1903) 139 Cal. 325, 72 Pac. 864; Montague v. Furness (1904) 145 Cal. 205, 78 Pac. 640.

These California decisions seem to be contrary to the earlier cases of People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard (1902) 136 Cal. 55, 68 Pac. 576, infra, and Union Sheet Metal Works v. Dodge (1900) 129 Cal. 390, 62 Pac. 41, in both of which bonds under the same statute, given in connection with contracts to build schoolhouses, were sustained.

In People's Lumber Co. v. Gillard (Cal.) supra, where a contractor contracted with a high school district and gave a bond under the same statute, it was held that the unconstitutionality of the statute was immaterial. The court said: "The bond no doubt was made pursuant to the statute; but it was voluntarily made, and may be enforced as a common-law bond, as it is substantially in form. . . . It was competent for the parties to enter into such an obligation, whether the statute authorized it or not; and it is none the less binding because the statute requires it. No statutory authority is required to give validity to bonds of this character, and if there were no statute on the subject it would be quite within the ordinary and prudential administration of the affairs of the school district for the board to require some guaranty, by bond or otherwise, for the faithful performance of the work. The bond derives force from its provisions, and not from any statute." The above decision was held to be the law of the case on a further appeal in (1907) 5 Cal. App. 435, 90 Pac. 556.

But if a bond executed under an unconstitutional statute is involuntary, and based upon no independent consideration, it will fall with such unconstitutional statute. Love v. McCoy, ante, 832.

Thus, no action will lie upon a bond given to discharge a vessel from an attachment, when the attachment was issued in pursuance of an unconstitutional statute. Brookman v. Hamill (1871) 43 N. Y. 554, 3 Am. Rep. 731; Poole v. Kermit (1875) 59 N. Y. 554.

In Cassel v. Scott (1861) 17 Ind. 514, it was said that bonds given under an unconstitutional act to regulate the retailing of spirituous liquors, etc., were unsupported by any valid consideration.

It would seem, however, that the principle of estoppel might well have applied in Coburn v. Townsend (1894) 103 Cal. 233, 37 Pac. 202, where it was held, though not necessary to the result, that a bond given in pursuance of an order of court in condemnation proceedings, permitting the plaintiff in such proceedings to take possession on giving such bond, was void, the statutes under which such order was made being unconstitutional.

For the question whether a bond of a public official, intended as a statutory bond, but not binding as such, can be enforced as a common-law bond, see the note in 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 766. And see, in this connection, the note in L.R.A. 1917B, 990, 1017, as to enforceability as a common-law bond of a statutory bond which contains provisions unauthorized by the statute.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court for Ohio County in his favor in part only in a suit to compel specific performance of a contract of employment. Modified and affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frank W. Nesbitt, for appellant:

Plaintiff is entitled to both stock dividends and cash dividends which have been declared and paid since December, 1910, upon the ten shares of stock which the defendant by her contract agreed to give to the plaintiff in consideration for services to be rendered by him.

And he is entitled to the stock dividend of January 8, 1914, for the reason that a stock dividend is in reality no dividend at all, but is simply an arrangement under which the stockholders are given new evidences of the interests which they already hold.

The court below had full jurisdiction to decree for specific performance, and was clearly justified in doing so.

Mr. J. F. Cree for appellees.

Ritz, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff claims that he was employed by the defendant Lucy M. George in the month of December, 1910, to recover for her 160 shares of stock of the S. George Company, of which she claimed she had been deprived by fraudulent practices of other parties. At the time of the employment, according to the contention of the plaintiff, Mrs. George proposed to give him for his services, and he accepted the offer, 10 shares of stock of the S. George Company, of which stock Mrs. George owned a large number of shares in addition to the 160 shares involved in the litigation. After the agreement was made the plaintiff instituted and prosecuted the suit to a successful conclusion, recovering the 160 shares of stock for Mrs. George. This result was reached in June, 1914. The plaintiff states that shortly after he accepted the employment from Mrs. George on the terms above mentioned, he asked her to transfer to him the 10 shares of stock; that she then raised no question about his right to have the 10 shares of stock, but suggested that it would be better not to transfer them to him until after the litigation was concluded, inasmuch as it might embarrass him to attend meetings of the corporation stockholders while the litigation was in progress, the litigation being with the other stockholders of the corporation, and it might embarrass the corporation's affairs unless all of the stock was represented at such stockholders' meetings. For this reason he made no further demand upon her to transfer the stock to him until after the litigation was determined, and her stock recovered for her. After the contract was entered into there was a stock dividend of 20 per cent declared on this stock, and a number of cash dividends, which are set out in the record. Mrs. George admits that she employed Mr. Hubbard for the purpose of instituting and prosecuting the suit for the recovery of her 160 shares of stock, but she denies that she agreed to give him 10 shares of the S. George Company stock for his services, and says that there was no agreement as to what compensation he should receive. The court below found as a matter of fact that the contract had been entered into as alleged by the plaintiff, and entered a decree requiring the defendant Lucy M. George to transfer to the plaintiff 10 shares of the stock of the S. George Company standing in her name on the books of said company, and enjoining her from transferring such stock to anyone else, and directed the defendant the S. George Company to pay the dividends on 10 shares of said stock to the plaintiff until such time as such transfer was effected, and decreed in favor of the plaintiff for the dividends declared on said 10 shares since June, 1914, the date of the termination of the litigation. From this decree plaintiff appealed, and contends that, in addition to the 10 shares of stock which the court awarded him, he is entitled to have a decree for the 20 per cent stock dividend, or have 12 shares of stock as it stands at the present time, as well as have the cash dividends, which, however, are not in dispute, the court having decreed in his favor for the cash dividends from June, 1914, and he not insisting on the cash dividends prior to that time. The sole question presented by the plaintiff is: Does the stock dividend declared early in the year 1914 go to him, or is he only entitled to the 10 shares of stock and the dividends declared thereon after he completed the contract of service?

The defendant Lucy M. George assigns cross error. She contends that plaintiff ought not to be allowed to maintain the suit at all, for the reason that he has failed to prove his contract by a preponderance of the testimony, and the court should have for that reason dismissed his bill; for the further reason that equity has no jurisdiction to entertain a suit to specifically enforce a contract of this character, the remedy at law being adequate to cover either the value of the stock or the value of his services; and, further, that the contract, even as claimed by the plaintiff, is void for the reason that it provided for the payment of compensation to an attorney at law out of the subject-matter of the litigation.

It may be said that the evidence in this case upon the question as to Mr. Hubbard's employment for the prosecution of the suit is undisputed; the dispute arises upon the agreement he asserts for his compensation. Upon this the parties are sharply in conflict. The learned chancellor in the circuit court, after carefully weighing all of the evidence, found that Mr. Hubbard had proved his contract, and that it existed as contended for by him. It has been so frequently held by this court that the findings of fact of a circuit judge upon conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal, unless the preponderance is clearly against such finding, that we need not cite authority to sustain the proposition. That is the L.R.A.1918C.

case here. The evidence upon this question is sharply in conflict, and we will not disturb the findings of fact of the chancellor thereon.

Mrs. George next contends that the suit cannot be maintained, because the remedy at law is adequate; that the plaintiff could sue at law and recover the value of the 10 shares of stock, or, if he failed to prove that he had a contract for any specific compensation, recover the value of his services. Of course, plaintiff's right to recover in this case depends entirely upon establishing the contract as asserted by him. He could not maintain a suit in equity to recover compensation for his services as attorney for the defendant. It may further be said that, even though the defendant Mrs. George had agreed to pay him for his services certain shares of stock, he could not maintain a suit in equity to compel the transfer of such shares of stock, unless it is made to appear that the shares of stock so agreed to be delivered to him are of peculiar value, or the value thereof not easily ascertainable. Hogg v. McGuffin, 67 W. Va. 456, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 491, 68 S. E. 41; Cook, Corp. §§ 337, 338. The rationale of this doctrine is that the purchaser may desire the particular stock for the purpose of securing to himself control of the corporation, or of preventing the control of the same by antagonistic interests; or, where the stock has no such peculiar value to him, still if it has no well-recognized value in the market, or the value is not easily ascertainable, a judgment at law may be adequate to compensate him for the stock, or it may not be; because of the difficulty in proving the real value of it, he may receive more than he is entitled to, or he may receive less. In this case witnesses who are conversant with this corporation fix the value of its stock over a wide range, some saying that it is about $104 a share, and others fixing it much higher. Undoubtedly from the evidence the jury would be warranted in finding that the value of the stock was $104 a share, and we have no doubt that such a finding would be to the prejudice of the plaintiff; or the jury might find that the value of it was the highest price mentioned, and we have no doubt that such a finding would be to the prejudice of the defendant Mrs. George, so that courts of equity entertain jurisdiction, and it is a well-recognized ground of such jurisdiction to specifically enforce contracts for the delivery of corporate shares where those shares have peculiar value to the purchaser, or where, because of the difficulty in ascertaining the market value thereof, a court of law cannot adequately compensate the complaining party. Such, we think, is the case here.

Mrs. George further contends that, conceding that she made such a contract as that relied upon by Mr. Hubbard, it cannot be enforced for the reason that it is void as against public policy. We are a little at a loss to understand the basis for this contention. Both parties were competent to contract. Mr. Hubbard was an attorney at law, his services were desired by Mrs. George, he was willing to render her the services, and she was willing to give him 10 shares of stock therefor, and the parties contracted upon this basis. There can be no doubt but that it is perfectly proper and right for an attorney to enter into a contract with one desiring his services fixing the compensation which he is to receive. Thornton, Attorneys at Law, pp. 723 et seq. The case of Keenan v. Scott, 64 W. Va. 137, 61 S. E. 806, is relied upon for the contention that the contract set up here is void as against public policy. That case has no application. It was held there that after the employment of an attorney under a contract by which his compensation is fixed, and the relation of attorney and client is established, any change that is made in it increasing the amount of the compensation agreed on in the beginning will be held to be voidable as against public policy. There are other authorities cited sustaining this proposition, and it is good law. Certainly, after an attorney is employed and his compensation agreed upon, he cannot secure any other agreement from his client while this confidential relation is existing materially altering the first one, without subjecting it to the liability of being overthrown at the election of his client. But no such principle is involved here. The contract that is relied upon by the plaintiff was made at the time he accepted the employment, and no reason is perceived, nor is any authority cited, that would indicate that it is not entirely competent for an attorney to agree with the party proposing the employment to him upon the amount of his compensation at the time of such employment as a part of the contract of employment. If such were not the case, the compensation of attorneys would always be uncertain and indefinite, and left to be determined, when the parties could not agree after the conclusion of the litigation, by a suit in court. Such a holding would have a tendency to promote litigation, while the policy of the law is exactly the contrary.

The plaintiff contends that the decree of the court below is wrong and to his prejudice, in that the 20 per cent stock dividend declared in 1914 was not decreed to him, as well as the 10 shares of stock. He contends that, instead of decreeing to him 10 shares of stock with the dividends paid thereon from June, 1914, the court below should have decreed to him 12 shares of stock with these dividends, and it was to correct this alleged error that he prosecuted this appeal. Dividends declared on corporate stocks are the property of the real owner of the stock at the time of the declaration of the dividend. Rose v. Barclay, 191 Pa. 594, 45 L.R.A. 392, 43 Atl. 385; 10 Cyc. 556. The only question here is, Who was the real owner of this stock at the time of the declaration of this dividend? The stock certificate was not delivered to Mr. Hubbard, nor was any transfer thereof made upon the books of the company, and it is contended that because of this failure to transfer to him the stock certificate, or transfer the shares on the books, there was no title in him. It may be true that the legal title had not passed, but was not the full equitable interest vested in the plaintiff from and after the making of the contract of employment? It occurs to us that the action of the court in holding that the contract existed, and that the plaintiff was entitled to have the stock transferred, must necessarily carry with it the finding that the full equitable interest was transferred to the plaintiff by the contract of employment set up and relied upon by him. If it were not transferred to him by this contract, he never got it at all. Even though we were to treat the contract as a sale of this stock to the plaintiff, to be delivered when he had performed the services, still under the authorities he would be entitled to take the stock with everything that accrued therefrom after the making of the contract between him and Mrs. George. It must be borne in mind that the certificates are not the property; they are but evidence of the stockholder's interest in the corporation. The stock is the interest in the corporation itself, and when a purchaser agrees to pay a certain sum of money for 10 shares of the stock of a particular corporation, the agreement is to pay the sum of money agreed upon for a certain proportion of the assets of that corporation; and should the corporation subsequently declare a stock dividend, or any other sort of dividend, and thereby make each of its shares a less interest in the corporation than it formerly was, surely the purchaser would be entitled to the dividend thus declared in order to give him what he contracted for. 7 R. C. L. § 267. In the case of Black v. Homersham, L. R. 4 Exch. Div. 24, 48 L. J. Exch. N. S. 79, 39 L. T. N. S. 671, 27 Week. Rep. 171, it was held that, where shares of stock were sold on the 1st of August to be paid for on the 29th day of August, and a dividend was declared between the day of sale and the day provided for payment, such dividend belonged to the purchaser. So we must say here these shares of stock were sold in December, 1910, to be paid for by Mr. Hubbard with services to be rendered as long as was necessary in the prosecution of that particular litigation, and any dividends declared upon this stock after the date of the purchase or contract with him belonged to him. In Harris v. Stevens, 7 N. H. 454, it was held that, where one offered to sell another certain shares of stock on a certain day with the privilege to such other to accept the offer within a certain time, the offer being accepted within the time, the purchaser was entitled to a dividend declared upon the shares between the time the offer was made and the date of the acceptance thereof, upon the theory that what the party was buying was what was offered to him, and if he did not get the dividend, he was getting less than that, because it cannot be doubted that every declaration of a dividend to that extent reduces the value of the property of the corporation. After a dividend is declared the amount thereof becomes a debt of the corporation to its stockholders. Before it is declared it is the property of the corporation, and so it is easy to be seen that by the declaration of a dividend the value of the corporate assets is decreased to the extent that it is necessary to take them to pay such dividend. What Mr. Hubbard undertook to do in this case in December, 1910, was to perform certain services agreed upon between him and the defendant for 10 shares of the stock of the S. George Company. He was entitled to have the interest in that corporation represented by these 10 shares unimpaired by the subsequent declaration of dividends, and the only way that he could get the interest he actually contracted for was to give him the dividends declared on the stock subsequent to the making of his contract. A like holding was made in the case of Currie v. White, 45 N. Y. 822.

We are of opinion that the decree entered in the court below will have to be modified so as to require Mrs. George to transfer to the plaintiff 12 shares of the stock of the S. George Company instead of 10 shares, and to require her to pay him the cash dividends provided in the decree of the lower court upon 12 shares of stock instead of 10 shares thereof, as therein provided. With this modification the decree will be affirmed, with costs to the appellant.

APPEAL by complainant from a decree of the City Court of Birmingham sustaining demurrers to a bill filed to rescind a subscription to corporate stock and to recover the money paid thereon. Reversed.

Statement by Mayfield, J.:

Appellant, as a stockholder in the appellee bank, filed this his bill against the bank and the state superintendent of banks, who had taken over the bank to the end of its liquidation under the statute of this state. The purpose of the bill is to rescind the contract of subscription by which complainant purchased his stock, and have refunded to him the amount paid therefor; viz., $10,000.

The alleged ground for rescission is that fraudulent representations were made to complainant by the promoters and incorporators of the bank, touching the financial condition of the bank when organized, its assets and liabilities. These representations were in writing, in the form of a letter written by one of the promoters of the corporation, who, it is alleged, had been agreed on as the president to be elected of the corporation and who was shortly thereafter elected to the place, and was acting as such official.

It is also alleged that it was agreed among the several promoters and incorporators that the letter in question should be written, and that it was so written, in response to a letter written by appellant's attorney, requesting that the incorporators give a signed statement as to the financial condition and status of the proposed banking corporation, in the way of assets, liabilities, encumbrances, etc. The representations alleged to be false were as follows:

"(1) There will be approximately $250,000 in cash to be turned over by the state superintendent of banks.

"(2) The issue of $400,000 of 6 per cent third mortgage bonds has been placed on a par basis, which will be, in fact, more than sufficient to pay all the indebtedness of the old bank and the floating indebtedness of the building company, should we find that we need the money.

"(3) Approximately $1,150,000 in cash will be on hand when the new bank opens August 2, 1915."

It is also alleged that the representations were made with the intent to deceive appellant, that he relied upon them and acted upon them and that they did deceive him. It is also alleged in the bill that before the letter was written containing the false statements, it had been agreed among the incorporators of the bank that they would send one of their number, viz., one Malone, together with appellant's attorney, who resided in Birmingham, to the home of appellant, in Georgetown, [Kentucky], to induce appellant to subscribe for stock in the new corporation to be formed.

The letter* was written and was written for the purpose of obtaining data to present to appellant, for his information in determining whether or not he would take stock in the proposed corporation. The information was presented to him, as was intended to be done, and he acted on it.

It is also alleged that appellant was a nonresident of the state at the time he was induced to subscribe for the stock, and did subscribe and pay his money therefor: that he was at his home in Georgetown, Kentucky, ill and confined to his room.

It is alleged that appellant subscribed for his stock on or about the 25th day of July.

*The letters referred to in the statement are as follows:

W. N. Malone, City.

Dear Sir:—

I think it would be a good idea to get a short statement signed by Mr. Jackson and Mr. Hutton, too, if here, as trustees for the incorporators, showing the following facts, so that we can exhibit it to Colonel Stone: (1) Approximately the amount of cash that will be received by the new bank from the state superintendent of banks; (2) show whether or not the third mortgage bond on the building has been placed so as to enable the building company to pay off its indebtedness to the old bank, and the total amount of cash that will be received by the new bank from this source; (3) the total amount of cash assets on hand when the bank opens for business; (4) the total amount of liabilities of the old bank assumed by the new bank; (5) the appraised value of the real estate, less encumbrances of the old bank, to be acquired by the new bank; (6) the face value of all other assets of the old bank, and the probable amount of same that can be collected; (7) in the last above item please keep the interest in the building company separate from other assets.

Yours very truly,

In reply to this letter is the following:

In reply to your favor of recent date, addressed to W. N. Malone, beg to say that we had a committee of prominent bankers pass upon the commercial loan of the Jefferson County Savings Bank, and this committee of bankers suggested a real estate committee to pass upon the real estate and real estate loans. From the reports and other information which we have received, the following are the facts as we see them: [Here follow the first, second, and third representations as set out by Judge Mayfield in his statement of fact] (4) the total liabilities of the old bank to be assumed by the new bank is approximately $1,287,000, which is composed of savings and checking accounts; (5) the appraised value of the real estate, including old bank building, is $179,000, which is carried on the books of the old bank at $140,000; (6) the face value of all the assets of the old bank acquired by the new bank is about $1,800,000, and we feel that there can be collected a salvage of from $300,000 to $400,000.

Trusting this information is what you want, I am yours very truly,

A. E. Jackson.

1915, and that the bank was organized on the 29th day of July, 1915, commencing the banking business on or about the 2d day of August, 1915, and continued to do business in Birmingham, Alabama, until the 28th day of January, 1916, when it was taken over by the state bank superintendent for the purpose of its liquidation in accordance with the state laws.

It is also alleged that appellant did not know of the falsity of the statements made to him, and upon which he relied and acted, until the 21st day of February, 1916, after the bank had been taken over by the state superintendent of banks; that on account of his nonresidence and absence from the state, and of his ill health, he had had no opportunity to learn the true financial condition of the bank, or of the falsity of the statements, until after the bank was so taken over.

The bill also alleges that the appellee bank was organized, with the knowledge and consent of the state superintendent of banks, for the purpose of taking over the assets and assuming the liabilities of the Jefferson County Savings Bank, which was then in process of liquidation under the control of the state bank superintendent; that it was therefore the object, in forming this new bank, that it acquire all the assets and business of the old corporation, and carry on its business in the building formerly occupied and owned and controlled by the old corporation; and that this purpose or intention was carried out, the new corporation continuing the business of the old, until it was in turn taken over by the state bank superintendent for the purposes of liquidation. The letters will show that the statements related largely to assets acquired from the bank absorbed, and to its liabilities assumed. It is also alleged that appellant was a stockholder in the old bank afterwards absorbed by the new one.

It therefore appears that the object and purpose of the letters in question was to inform appellant as to the assets which would be acquired from the old bank absorbed, as to the liabilities assumed in consequence thereof, and as to the encumbrances upon the property acquired by the absorption of the old bank.

It is therefore made to clearly appear that appellant had a right to rely upon these representations, and that he did rely upon them: and if they were false and resulted to his damage, he ought to have a remedy of some kind, against some person or firm.

Mayfield, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If this were a suit between man and man, or between two individuals, under the facts averred, all would concede that the bill contains equity, and that it was not subject to the demurrer interposed.

The following principles are well settled by the authorities, or are patently correct:

A material false statement, relied upon by the other party in ignorance of its falsity, and which materially influences him to enter into the contract, constitutes a fraud which will authorize a rescission. Sledge v. Scott, 56 Ala. 202; Perry v. Johnston, 59 Ala. 648; Davis v. Betz, 66 Ala. 206; Rice v. Gilbreath, 119 Ala. 424, 24 So. 421; Brewer v. Arantz, 124 Ala. 127, 26 So. L.R.A.1918C.

922; Moore v. Barber Asphalt Paving Co. 118 Ala. 563, 23 So. 798; Mayfield's Dig. 182.

As a condition precedent to the exercise of the right of rescission, the party complaining must, if practicable, restore, or offer to restore, to the other party, what he had received from him by virtue of the contract. Cozzins v. Whitaker, 3 Stew. & P. 322; Jemison v. Woodruff, 34 Ala. 143; Young v. Arntze, 86 Ala. 116, 5 So. 253; Rice v. Gilbreath, 119 Ala. 424, 24 So. 421. This obviously has no application, however, where it has become impossible for such party to make such restoration by reason of the conduct or default of such other party. Johnson v. Oehmig, 95 Ala. 189, 36 Am. St. Rep. 204, 10 So. 430.

The right to a rescission on account of fraud does not depend upon the insolvency of the other party, nor upon the inadequacy of an action at law for damages. Baker v. Maxwell, 99 Ala. 558, 14 So. 468.

Courts of equity do not take jurisdiction merely for the purpose of declaring a rescission, but only for the purpose of administering some form of equitable relief or protection not available in other forums, or where, by reason of the insolvency of the offending party, a judgment at law might fail to compensate the injured party, or to place him in statu quo. Merritt v. Ehrman, 116 Ala. 278, 22 So. 514; Hafer v. Cole, 176 Ala. 248, 57 So. 757; 7 Mayfield's Dig. 182.

The bill in this case as last amended clearly and explicitly brings the case within the above rules of law.

Is the result different, or are rules of law different, where one of the parties, the defendant, is a corporation which has received the benefit of the contract induced by fraud and sought to be rescinded, but which ceased to be a going concern before rescission sought, with its property lodged in the hands of a receiver or of a representative in law, to the end of the administration or liquidation of its affairs, as is shown to be the case, at bar? Or are the effect and result different when the false representations were not made by the officers of the corporation, or, if made by the officers, were made at a time when they were not in fact or in law such, though they became such soon after, and when the representations were made about, and for and on behalf of, the corporation, and not of the persons making them, and when the corporation received the benefit or result of the representations? These questions are not so easy of answer. And if the answer is that they make different cases, wherein are they different, and what are the rules applicable to each?

We have not been referred to any decision of this court in a case in all respects similar to this; hence we must look to the text-books and to the adjudicated cases of other courts, or for authority in like cases. We have decisions of this court in cases somewhat similar; that is, in which actions at law, or defenses to actions, on subscriptions for stock in corporations, rested on the ground of the right of the stockholder to rescind and recover back what he has paid, or to avoid liability as for the consideration not paid, because of the fraud of the corporation or of its agents in procuring the subscription. It was once held that an action for fraud or deceit would not lie against a corporation, because the gist of the action was fraudulent intent, and intent was not imputable to an artificial body; but in more recent times it is almost universally held that such actions will lie against corporations.

There are at present many courts, and extant many decisions, holding that a corporation cannot have an agent before it has an existence, just as a deceased person or an unborn child or even an infant cannot have or appoint an agent; and for this reason it is said that corporations are not liable for the fraud of their promoters (as in the making of false representations or the circulating of deceptive prospectuses, or otherwise) committed before the corporation comes into existence. This is on the theory that, as neither the corporation itself nor its agents committed the fraud, the corporation is not responsible therefor.

There are, however, other decisions and authorities holding that, while the corporation could not act itself nor have an agent before it had existence, yet, if the contract of subscription to the capital stock of the corporation to be formed was induced by the fraud of the promoters, the subscriber, in certain cases, might have relief against the corporation: (1) If he has paid his money to the corporation for his shares under conditions which will authorize an action for deceit, he may surrender or tender his stock to the corporation in an action for money had and received; (2) if he be sued by the corporation on his subscription contract, he may set up the fraud of the promoters in procuring his subscription as a defense; (3) he may go into equity and rescind the contract, and have the money paid by him on the fraudulent contract refunded. This last remedy, says Mr. Cook, is the fairest, safest, and most convenient remedy for all parties. It is notice to all parties interested in the matter not to further rely upon the contract of subscription, and avoids the risk of the future insolvency of the corporation, which might defeat all relief by the stockholder L.R.A.1918C.

against the corporation. Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 155. In order, however, for the corporation to be bound by the acts of its promoters, it must, after it comes into existence, do some act which makes the contract binding on it; it is sometimes said that it must ratify the contract, but, strictly speaking, it cannot and does not ratify. As pointed out by the textwriters and judges, contracts made by promoters for the corporation to be organized cannot in law or in equity be ratified by the corporation when it comes into existence, because ratification implies at least the existence of a person or thing in whose behalf the contract might have been made at the time it was made. Being incapable of binding the corporation when they were made, for the all-sufficient reason that the corporation then had no existence, such contracts cannot afterwards be ratified by the body.

It is held, nevertheless, by many courts, that, while there can be no ratification of the contract "qua" contract, yet there may be created an equitable liability on equitable grounds, or as it is sometimes stated, while it cannot ratify contracts made in its behalf before it had an existence, yet after the corporation comes into existence it can exercise its powers to contract, and may do so by accepting the contracts so made for it, and thereafter adopting them as its own. This last doctrine rests upon the ground that the promoters' contract was in the nature only of a proposal, which the corporation could accept or reject after it came into existence.

It does seem to us to be in keeping with the rules of justice and of law that, where the parties who made the contract intended that the prospective corporation, when formed, should become a party to the undertaking, and intended that the contract should be for the use and benefit of the corporation, and the corporation does accept the benefit, it thereby adopts the proposed contract as fully as if it had been an original party thereto.

In the case at bar the corporation bank availed itself of a subscription made for shares before it was formed, and received the price paid therefor, and issued to the subscriber certificates of stock, thereby treating him as a shareholder. This, as all the authorities hold, was sufficient to bind the subscriber, and we think it ought to bind also the corporation. Its obligations and its benefits ought to be mutual, and to be as binding as if it had made the original contract of subscription by its legally authorized agents. This has been held by this court. Davis Bros. v. Montgomery Furnace & Chemical Co. 101 Ala.

127, 8 So. 496; Moore & H. Hardware Co. v. Towers Hardware Co. 87 Ala. 206, 13 Am. St. Rep. 23, 6 So. 41; Cook, Stock & Stockholders, § 707.

We have examined a number of cases in which subscriptions to capital stock have been canceled by courts of equity, where the subscription was procured by the fraud of agents after the corporation was formed; and it seems to us that the same rules should apply to other cases, except where their application would prejudice the interests of other subscribers. As to these cases, see Southern States Fire & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Whatley, 173 Ala. 101, 55 So. 620; Southern States Fire & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Tanner, 180 Ala. 30, 60 So. 81; Southern States Fire & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Brannon, 178 Ala. 115, 59 So. 60; Alabama Foundry & Mach. Works v. Dallas, 127 Ala. 513, 29 So. 459; Southern States Fire & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Cromartie, 181 Ala. 295, 61 So. 907; Southern States Fire & Casualty Ins. Co. v. Wilmer Store Co. 180 Ala. 1, 60 So. 98; Garner v. Hall, 114 Ala. 166, 21 So. 835.

In the case of Planters' & M. Independent Packet Co. v. Webb, 144 Ala. 666, 39 So. 562, the subscriber was held liable, though no formal subscription was entered and there was then no corporation, and in that case it was said:

"That 'a subscription for stock implies a promise to pay for it, even though the subscription was before incorporation, is the rule sustained by the great weight of authority.' 1 Cook, Corp. §§ 71, 75; 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law. 902; 1 Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 47, 54. A subscriber may be bound by an actual subscription made before incorporation or organization, although he makes no cash payment, and the proceedings after incorporation are without notice to him. 26 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 902.

" 'A direct subscription to take stock may be enforced by the corporation, even though such subscription was made prior to the incorporation. An agreement reading, 'The undersigned hereby subscribe for the number of shares set opposite our names,' may be enforced by the corporation when it is formed.' Id. §§ 73, 75.

" 'When an action is brought to collect a subscription, either directly or indirectly, for the benefit of the corporate creditors, it is well established that the subscribers cannot defeat such action by the defense that the corporation was not an incorporation, by reason of its not having fully complied with the terms of the statute providing for such an incorporation. Not only is the subscriber estopped by the act of subscribing from setting up this defense, L.R.A.1918C.

but he is bound also by the rule that the existence of a corporation cannot be inquired into except by a direct proceeding in behalf of the state.' Id. § 184."

If the subscriber should be so held to the agreement with the promoters, it does seem that, so far as the corporation itself is concerned, it ought to be so held.

The case of Broadus v. Russell, 160 Ala. 353, 49 So. 327, id., on former appeal, — Ala. —, 39 So. 712, dealt with the liability of promoters and of the corporation, and with the rights and liabilities of subscribers, under guaranties or warranties made by the promoters to the subscriber as to acts to be done in the future by the corporation, but is not decisive of the question here involved.

This case, so far as this particular phase of it is concerned, in our opinion falls within the rule that, when contracts are made for the benefit of another, but without his agency or even his consent, they may be either rejected or accepted and affirmed by him, and that, if he accepts, he adopts the bad as well as the good, the burden as well as the benefit. And if he seeks to enforce such a contract, it may be impeached or rescinded on account of the fraud or wrong of the party making the same for him, just as if he or his agent had made it; and where he has accepted the benefits of it, he may be by the other party required to bear the burden thereof.

The New Hampshire court thus states the rule: "Fortunately the justice of this case is the law of it. I take it to be clear law that the defendant cannot affirm the trade made on his behalf by Hutchinson, and so treat him as his agent in the matter to that extent, without, at the same time, adopting the ill-omened means whereby it was brought about. He takes it cum onere, and, unless he can sustain it as a whole, he must be content to see it fall as a whole, and his gains, of course, go with it." Presby v. Parker, 56 N. H. 409.

The New Jersey court, speaking through Beasley, Ch. J., states the rule thus: "The action was against the bank for deceit, which was alleged to consist in certain fraudulent representations charged to have been made on a sale of stock to the plaintiff by the directors of such corporation as its agents. Lord Chelmsford, in giving his views, said: 'The distinction to be drawn from the authorities, and which is sanctioned by sound principle, appears to be this: Where a person has been drawn into a contract to purchase shares belonging to a company, by fraudulent misrepresentations of the directors, and suit is brought in the name of the company to seek to enforce that contract, or the person who has been deceived institutes a suit against the company to rescind the contract on the ground of fraud, the misrepresentations are imputable to the company, and the purchaser cannot be held to his contract, because the company cannot retain any benefit which they have obtained through the fraud of their agents. But if the person who has been induced to purchase shares by the fraud of the directors, instead of seeking to set aside the contract, prefers to bring an action of damages for the deceit, such an action cannot be sustained against the company, but only against the directors personally.' Lord Cranworth, in his opinion, puts himself on the same ground, and says: 'A person defrauded by the directors, if the subsequent acts and dealings of the parties have been such as to leave him no remedy but an action for the fraud, must seek his remedy against the directors personally.'" Kennedy v. McKay, 43 N. J. L. 288, 291, 39 Am. Rep. 581.

In our case nearest in point this court has thus spoken: "The general doctrine is well established, and obtains both at law and in equity, that a corporation is a distinct entity, to be considered separate and apart from the individuals who compose it, and is not to be affected by the personal rights, obligations, and transactions of its stockholders; and this whether said rights accrued, or obligations were incurred, before or subsequent to incorporation. Morawetz, Priv. Corp. 227-234, 547-549; Morrison v. Gold Mountain Gold Min. Co. 52 Cal. 309, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 578; Hawkins v. Mansfield Gold Min. Co. 52 Cal. 515, 13 Mor. Min. Rep. 581; Gent v. Manufacturers' & Mut. Ins. Co. 107 Ill. 658; Caledonian R. Co. v. Helensburgh, 2 Macq. H. L. Cas. 391, 2 Jur. N. S. 695, 4 Week. Rep. 671; Penn. Match Co. v. Hapgood, 141 Mass. 147, 7 N. E. 22. There is a class of contracts, however, which are entered into between the promoters or prospectors of a contemplated corporation and third persons, on the faith of the corporation, intended to inure to its benefit, and which in point of fact do inure to its benefit, on which the corporation will be charged, even in the absence of an express promise to perform, or ratification on the part of the company after it is in esse, on 'the familiar principle that one who accepts the benefit of a contract, which another volunteers to perform in his name and on his behalf, is bound to take the burden with the benefit.' Redf. Railways, 5th ed. 18; Edwards v. Grand Junction R. Co. 1 Myl. & C. 650, 40 Eng. Reprint, 525, 1 Eng. Ry. & C. Cas. 173, 6 L. J. Ch. N. S. L.R.A.1918C.

St. Rep. 23, 6 So. 43.

The above case is reported in 13 Am. St. Rep. 23, with an extensive note thereto.

Is the complainant a "third party" within the meaning of the expression used above or entitled to the protection of such party? If he is, is he entitled to relief in equity as well as at law?

The next cases nearest in point are Rives v. Montgomery South Pl. Road Co. 30 Ala. 92, and Montgomery Southern R. Co. v. Matthews, 77 Ala. 357, 364, 365, 54 Am. Rep. 60. In the latter case the former is construed and its holding readopted, and therein it is said: "In Rives v. Montgomery South Pl. Road Co. supra, the suit was on a subscription to the capital stock of the Plank Road Company. The defense was fraud in procuring the subscription. On the trial 'the defendant offered to prove that, before he subscribed for any stock in said company, and before its organization under its charter, two of its subscribers for stock, one of whom was afterwards elected president and the other secretary of the corporation, represented to him that the road would be so located as to pass through his plantation, thereby greatly enhancing the value of his land; that these representations were repeated by them after their election to their respective offices, and thereupon defendant subscribed for five shares of the capital stock of said company, and that said road, as afterwards located, did not pass within 5 miles of defendant's plantation.' This testimony was rejected by the court, on plaintiff's motion; and the propriety of that ruling was the sole question presented in this court. In passing on that question, the majority of this court said: 'We cannot doubt that the declarations of those officers, as offered by the defendant, were relevant and admissible. Those declarations certainly throw some light upon one of the material questions in the case; and to exclude them is to deny, practically, to the defendant, the right to prove the very basis on which he rests his defense. Until these declarations are proved, it is impossible to show that they were false, or that they formed an inducement to the defendant to subscribe.' It will be observed that in the case above we did not decide that the representation, even if not kept and conformed to as a promise, was in itself sufficient to avoid the subscription. That question was not before us. We simply held that it was legal evidence—a predicate for further testimony.” Montgomery Southern R. Co. v. Matthews, 77 Ala. 364, 54 Am. Rep. 60. “There can be no question that, if the stock subscription in this case was procured by the fraud of Kirkpatrick, the soliciting agent, the railroad corporation, claiming the benefit of the subscription, must take it tainted with Kirkpatrick’s fraud. Story, Agency, § 253; Corning v. Southland, 3 Hill, 552; Mead v. Bunn, 32 N. Y. 275; Harris v. Delamar, 38 N. C. (3 Ired. Eq.) 219; Meadows v. Smith, 42 N. C. (7 Ired. Eq.) 7.” 77 Ala. 365.

In a later case it is said: “In Montgomery Southern R. Co. v. Matthews, supra, it was said by this court, speaking through Stone, Ch. J.: ‘An opinion expressed, even if not realized, cannot, without more, become a fraudulent representation. If however, such opinion is falsely expressed, with intent to deceive, and does deceive, this constitutes such opinion or representation a false statement of fact, and vitiates a contract thereby procured, unless the representation relates to a matter equally open to both parties. This could not deceive.’ Lake v. Security Loan Asso. 72 Ala. 209; Bradfield v. Elyton Land Co. 93 Ala. 527, 8 So. 383; Birmingham Warehouse & E. Co. v. Elyton Land Co. 93 Ala. 549, 9 So. 235; Thompson, Bldg. & L. Asso., p. 178, note.” Johnson v. National Bldg. & L. Asso. 125 Ala. 465, 482, 82 Am. St. Rep. 257, 28 So. 2.

There can be no doubt that the fraudulent representations as averred in this bill belonged to a class authorizing the rescission of a contract made on the faith of them.

The Michigan courts, while announcing the same general rules as recognized by our court, denied relief solely on the ground that the promoters or organizers of the corporation were not its agents, and that the corporation was not bound by their frauds or representations. The court spoke thus on the subject: “This is an attempted application of the rule that, by accepting the benefits of a contract made by an agent, the principal is bound by the undertakings and promises of the agent. A number of cases are cited to sustain this contention, which manifestly must rest upon the proposition that the citizens’ committee was an agent of the company which its efforts created. Among the cases cited are many which support the general rule above stated, viz., that a principal must assume the obligations, if he wishes the benefits, of an unauthorized contract made by an agent. As stated by Paley: ‘Contracts made for the benefit of another, but without his privity or direction, may be rejected or affirmed at his election. But by making the election to affirm it, he adopts the agency altogether, as well that which is detrimental as that which is for his benefit. But in seeking to enforce contracts entered into by agents, the principal is subject to have them impeached by any conduct of his agent which would have had that effect if proceeding from himself. Every species of fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment, therefore, in the agent, affects the principal’s right to recover.’ Paley, Agency, 324; Hitchcock v. Griffin & S. Co. 99 Mich. 451, 41 Am. St. Rep. 624, 56 N. W. 373.” St. Johns Mfg. Co. v. Munger, 106 Mich. 90, 29 L.R.A. 63, 58 Am. St. Rep. 471, 64 N. W. 3.

“The promoters were persons who represented the meeting, or possibly themselves or some prospective stockholder, who for purposes of his own, desired to see the corporation organized. They cannot be said to be agents of the corporation in any sense. These subscribers contracted with each other to form a corporation, which they did. If one was guilty of fraud upon the others in procuring their subscriptions, a remedy should exist against such person. Doubtless a subscriber who is induced by fraud to agree to join in the organization of a corporation may refuse to do so on discovering fraud; but by carrying out his agreement and uniting with others, he has assumed new relations with them and the public, after which his remedy is restricted to action against the wrongdoers. See 4 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 201, and notes; Car-mody v. Powers, 60 Mich. 26, 26 N. W. 801.” 106 Mich. 95.

The Indiana court seems to have held with the Michigan court. See Shick v. Citizens Enterprise Co. 57 Am. St. Rep. 230, and note (15 Ind. App. 329, 44 N. E. 48). We do not mean to say that these are the only courts so holding.

The Virginia court seems to hold to the contrary, and in line with what this court has said, see 44 Am. St. Rep. 942, where the court says: “The authorities are abundant in the support of the general rule that a person fraudulently induced by an agent of a corporation—and a promoter is an agent—to subscribe to its capital stock may, at his option, repudiate the contract; and a fraud may consist as well in the suppression of what is true as in the representation of what is false. Indeed, the law is that where the person solicited to subscribe has no other information on the subject than that which the agent chooses to convey, the statements of the agent ought to be characterized by the utmost candor and honesty.” 1 Cook, Stock & Stockholders, 3d ed. § 147;

Crump v. United States Min. Co. 7 Gratt. 352, 56 Am. Dec. 116, 3 Mor. Min. Rep. 454; Bosher v. Richmond & H. Land Co. 89 Va. 455, 37 Am. St. Rep. 879, 16 S. E. 360; Central R. Co. v. Kisch, L. R. 2 H. L. 99, 36 L. J. Ch. N. S. 849, 16 L. T. N. S. 500, 15 Week. Rep. 821." Virginia Land Co. v. Haupt, 90 Va. 533, 44 Am. St. Rep. 939, 19 S. E. 168.

It seems to us that there is no sound reason why a subscriber should not be allowed to rescind a contract which was induced by the fraud of the promoters, even before the corporation was formed, if the contract was made for the use and benefit of the corporation, and it did so use it and receive the benefits of it. If the promoters are not, strictly speaking, agents of the corporation, they were agencies which wrought the fraud; and the corporation was the recipient of the fruits of the fraud, and it ought to bear the burdens thereof. The justice of the case ought to be the law of it; and an innocent subscriber who has been so defrauded, if he be diligent, ought to have relief. And so far as this record shows, appellant is both innocent and diligent; and there is no doubt that he has been defrauded without fault on his part.

While it is made to appear that the learned trial judge sustained the demurrer on the ground that the promoters were not agents of the corporation, and that no ratification or acceptance of the contract was shown (as to which ground we have reached a different conclusion), yet, before we reverse the decree sustaining the demurrer, we must see whether or not the decree should be sustained on other grounds.

The question next in importance raised by the demurrer is that, the bill showing that the corporation had gone into the hands of the state bank superintendent for liquidation before the filing of the bill, the bill contained no equity, whatever of equity it might have contained had the bank been a going concern. This seems to be, or at least once was, the law of England. This strict English rule seems not to prevail in America to its full extent. The American rule is thus stated by Mr. Cook and Mr. Thompson in their valuable works on Corporations, and the text is borne out by many decisions, state and Federal, cited in notes: "It seems to be the rule in this country, at least, that a defrauded subscriber may rescind such subscription after insolvency if he had not had a reasonable time to examine into the affairs of the corporation before such insolvency, or before the appointment of a receiver. This rule was expressly recognized by the United States Circuit Court." 1 Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 735. "A bill in equity to rescind a fraudulent sale of stock by a corporation lies even against the receiver of the corporation." 1 Cook, Corp. 6th ed. § 356.

It appears that in America such a bill lies even against the receiver of a corporation or an assignee under a general assignment, and that the fact of insolvency does not ipso facto prevent equity from awarding all relief under such bill; hence, if the bill should allege insolvency (which this bill does not do), it might, with other averments such as are contained in this bill, contain equity. Such a bill must, of course, show that the complainant acted promptly after the discovery of the fraud, that he was not guilty of laches, and that he was guilty of no negligence in discovering the fraud, and that he had not ratified the contract or waived the fraud after discovery, and had received no benefits thereafter, as a stockholder, in any dividends or profits, all of which this bill does, in the fullest and most specific terms. The bill certainly acquits the complainant of any neglect, wrong, or delay in the filing of his bill, or in the discovery of the fraud sought to be relieved against.

It may be true that in cases where the rights of creditors intervene, their rights may be superior to the rights of some or all of such stockholders, or it may be shown that the complainant is estopped as against some or all of such creditors; but these matters do not now appear on the face of the bill, and it is not required that the bill should negative such facts.

It is true the bill alleges the bank to be in a failing condition, and is being liquidated by the state bank superintendent, and the bill is against that officer. This averment was only necessary to give the bill equity as against such officer, not as against the bank. It is not at all necessary that the bank be insolvent before it can be taken over by such officer.

The only creditors of the bank shown by the bill are those whose debts were taken over by the new corporation when formed, and which were agreed to be taken over before it was formed. They are shown to be creditors of the old bank, and to have been such before the alleged fraud was committed on appellant. It is not shown that there are any creditors subsequent to the issuance of certificates or shares to appellant. There may or may not be such creditors; it is not necessary that the bill negative their existence, or show that they have been or can be paid in full, and yet allow the relief prayed in the bill. It may also be true that the claims of creditors of the old corporation are superior to the claims of complainant, or there may or may not be funds sufficient to pay all creditors, including the complainant if his relation be transformed from that of stockholder to that of creditor, as prayed in his bill; but it is not necessary that the bill should show these facts affirmatively, or negative prior rights of creditors of either class. These are matters that lie peculiarly within the knowledge of the bank and of the state superintendent of banks, and should be set up in the answer, and, of course, will depend upon the proof.

If it is made to appear that the corporation is wholly insolvent, then under our statute making the assets of such corporation a trust fund for the benefit of creditors it may be that no relief can or should be awarded to complainant.

If the contract is rescinded, then the complainant becomes one of the creditors; yet his rights by such change of relation may or may not be secondary to those of all other creditors. This, of course, can be determined only on final hearing on bill, answer, and proof, unless the facts are agreed on or admitted.

There can be no doubt as to the sufficiency of the averments to show fraud; the bill's averments in this respect could scarcely be made more specific or stronger, and no laches is shown. If the appellant is not entitled to the relief prayed, it must be made to appear by answer and proof. So far as now appears, he is entitled to some relief. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that the corporation has now no funds which would be availing to repay all or part of the money paid by complainant thereto, ought not to prevent his obtaining all relief, or the changing of his status from that of a stockholder to that of a creditor. There may be creditors as against whom he would not be allowed to thus change his status; yet as against the corporation and the promoters it does seem that he should be allowed to effect that change of relation.

Mr. Freeman, in a valuable note to the report of the case of Thompson v. Reno Sav. Bank, 3 Am. St. Rep. 797, has collected and reviewed most of the authorities up to that time on the subject; and the following principles deduced therefrom are stated by him: "The rule that a contract obtained by fraud is voidable at the election of the defrauded party applies to the contract of a shareholder in a corporation. Therefore, if one is induced to subscribe for or purchase shares of stock of a corporation through the fraud of its agents, he may have all the remedies, affirmative and defensive, against the corporation which he might have had against a principal in any other similar case. See Cook, Stock & Stockholders, §§ 135 et seq.; Thompson Liability of Stockholders, §§ 142 et seq.; note to Parker v. L.R.A.1918C.

Thomas, 81 Am. Dec. 392. But the contract entered into through fraud is voidable merely, and not absolutely void. It is valid and binding until the defrauded party elects to treat it as void. And if he fails to repudiate it before the rights of innocent third parties have intervened, their equities to treat it as valid may be superior to his claim to avoid it." 3 Am. St. Rep. 824.

"Some of the authorities seem to favor the view that in no case can fraud in obtaining the subscription be set up by the subscriber after the insolvency or bankruptcy of the corporation. This may be true under the English Companies' Act of 1862, by which it appears a creditor is entitled to hold every shareholder whose name is on the register of the company at the time proceedings are instituted to wind up the company for insolvency; but in America there seems to be no reason for the universality of the rule. Thus in Upton v. Englehart, 3 Dill. 496, 505, Fed. Cas. No. 16,800; Dillon, C. J. remarks: 'I am inclined to the opinion that if a company has fraudulently misrepresented or concealed material facts, and thus drawn an innocent person into the purchase of stock, he at the time being guilty of no want of reasonable caution and judgment, and afterwards guilty of no laches in discovering the fraud, and he thereupon without delay notifies the company that he repudiates the contract and offers to rescind the purchase, these facts concurring, I am inclined to the opinion that the bankruptcy of the company subsequently appearing will not enable the assignee to insist that the purchase of stock is binding upon him.' " 3 Am. St. Rep. 825.

The more recent cases are collected in a note to a West Virginia case reported in L.R.A.1915D, 792.

We are of the opinion that the trial court erred in sustaining the demurrer to the bill as last amended.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Edmund Tausaky, Henley C. Booth, and Stanley Moore, for petitioners:

The Associated Pipe Line Company has never been a common carrier of oil.

To now turn the Associated Pipe Line Company into a common carrier destroys the right of exclusive enjoyment of private property, and amounts to a taking of private property for public use without compensation first being made.

Shaw, Judge pro tem, delivered the opinion of the court:

These are proceedings in certiorari whereby each of the petitioners seeks the review and annulment of an order made by the Railroad Commission, requiring them to file with said Commission schedules of their rates and charges for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and the products thereof, by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin valley oil fields, in the state of California, and their rules and regulations in connection with such transportation.

The proceeding initiated of its own motion by the Commission, under and by virtue of chapter 327 of the laws of California found in Statutes of 1913, p. 657, is entitled: "In the Matter of the Compliance by Oil Pipe Lines with Provisions of Chapter 327 of the Laws of 1913, Declaring Certain Corporations, Associations, and Individuals to be Common Carriers and Public Utilities, and Subject to the Provisions of the Public Utilities Act."

Its declared purpose was an investigation to determine what corporations and associations were subject to the provisions of said act of the legislature. Pursuant to an order therein made, petitioners and a number of other corporations engaged in the transportation of crude oil and its products by means of pipe lines appeared before the Commission at a stated time and place to show cause why each of them should not file with the Commission the data and information therein specified, and otherwise comply with the law.

At the hearing had evidence was adduced touching the subject of inquiry, upon which the Commission made its findings and order which it is sought herein to have annulled.

Section 23, art. 12, of the Constitution of California, as amended in October, 1911, pursuant to which the act in question was adopted, is as follows: "Every private corporation, and every individual or association of individuals, owning, operating, managing, or controlling any commercial railroad, interurban railroad, street railroad, canal, pipe line, plant, or equipment, or any part of such railroad, canal, pipe line, plant or equipment within this state, for the transportation or conveyance of passengers, or express matter, or freight of any kind, including crude oil, or for the transmission of telephone or telegraph messages, or for the production, generation, transmission, delivery or furnishing of heat, light, water or power, or for the furnishing of storage or wharfage facilities, either directly or indirectly, to or for the public, and every common carrier, is hereby declared to be a public utility, subject to such control and regulation by the Railroad Commission as may be provided by the legislature, and every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the legislature to be public utilities shall likewise be subject to such control and regulation. The Railroad Commission shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities, in the state of California, and to fix the rates to be charged for commodities furnished, or services rendered by public utilities as shall be conferred upon it by the legislature, and the right of the legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

By this provision of the Constitution the people of the state, however novel, if not startling, the proposition may be, have in clear and unmistakable language declared that "every class of private corporations, individuals, or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the legislature to be public utilities, shall . . . be subject to . . . control and regulation" by the Railroad Commission, as provided by the legislature, and this without reference to the character of the business, whether it be a bootblack stand, grocery store, or agricultural pursuit conducted in a purely private capacity; and, further, that "the right of the legislature to confer powers upon the Railroad Commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution."

Acting in pursuance of the power so conferred, the legislature adopted the act referred to as chapter 327, § 3 of which provides that "any pipe line constructed, acquired, owned, operated, maintained, managed or controlled by any private corporation or individual or association of individuals for any of the purposes or under any of the conditions specified in § 1 or § 2 of this act, is hereby declared to be a public utility and subject to the provisions of the 'Public Utilities Act.'"

Referring to § 1, divided into four subdivisions, we find that by subdivisions designated (a), (b), and (c) the legislature declares to be common carriers and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act every private corporation, individual, or association of individuals (a) engaged in transporting crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof through a pipe line, "directly or indirectly, to or for the public, for hire, compensation or consideration of any kind, paid, given, extended or received, directly or indirectly, for such transportation;" (b) any like person or body "in favor of whom the right of eminent domain exists," engaged in such transportation to or for the public for hire, through a pipe line "constructed or maintained upon, along, over or under any public highway;" (c) any corporation, individual or association of individuals transporting crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof, to or for the public, for hire "or otherwise," by means of a pipe line "constructed, operated or maintained across, upon, along, over or under the right of way of any railroad corporation or other common carrier required by law to transport crude oil, petroleum or products thereof as a common carrier."

Restated, subdivision (a) of § 1 embraces only those engaged in the business of transporting oil as common carriers. Subdivision (b) is the same as subdivision (a), except that the act in its operation is restricted to those in whom the power of eminent domain exists (though not exercised), and whose pipe lines are constructed over public highways. Subdivision (c), retaining the provision that the transportation be for the public for hire, adds after the word "hire" the words "or otherwise," and restricts the operation of the provision to pipe lines constructed along the rights of way of common carriers required to transport oil. It thus appears that subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of § 1 apply solely and alone to those who, by means of pipe lines, are engaged in the transportation of crude oil and its products to or for the public.

As bringing the petitioners within the provisions of these subdivisions, the Commission found as a fact that in the transportation of crude oil and its products by means of pipe lines from the San Joaquin valley petitioners were common carriers thereof, or, in the language of the statute, they were engaged in transporting such articles "to or for the public for hire." In our opinion, there is no evidence to support this finding as to either of the petitioners.

In his work on Carriers, Mr. Moore, at page 22, vol. 1, defines a common carrier as one who "holds himself out as such to the world; that he undertakes generally and for all persons indifferently to carry goods and deliver them for hire; and that his public profession of his employment be such that, if he refuse, without some just ground, to carry goods for anyone, in the course of his employment and for a reasonable and customary price, he will be liable to an action."

It is one who offers to carry goods for any person between certain termini, and who is bound to carry for all who tender their goods and the price of carriage.

Whether the business conducted by petitioners was that of a common carrier as thus defined was a question of fact, since it may not be said that the intention of the legislature in enacting subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of § 1 of the act was to subject to public use pipe lines engaged in the business of transporting oil other than for the public. Indeed, such a legislation, if attempted, would have been futile, since, under the 14th Amendment of the Federal Constitution, no state shall deprive any person of property without due process of law, and to take or devote private property to public use without compensation is such deprivation. The record discloses no action on the part of either petitioner which constitutes an irrevocable dedication of its property to a public use such as the exercise of the sovereign power of the state in eminent domain. Wyman, Pub. Serv. Corp. § 214; State, Trenton & N. B. Turnp. Co., Prosecutors, v. American & E. Commercial News Co. 43 N. J. L. 381. Hence, in order to bring petitioners within the purview of L.R.A.1918C.

the provisions under consideration, it must have been made to appear that they had voluntarily devoted their transportation facilities to the indiscriminate use of the public for hire, thus constituting them common carriers.

As to the Associated Pipe Line Company, the evidence shows that it was incorporated in August, 1907, "for the acquisition, construction, leasing, owning, maintenance, and operation, but not as a common carrier, of pipe lines for transportation of oil within the state of California, together with necessary pumping stations thereunder." At the time in question the Southern Pacific Company was, through a subsidiary company known as the Kern Oil and Trading Company, having charge of its oil bureau, engaged in developing oil lands owned by it in Kern county, the production from which was intended for its own use, and, as a means of delivering the oil so produced to points along its line of railroad, it joined with the Associated Oil Company in the construction of two pipe lines, the aggregate daily carrying capacity of which, in 1913, was 38,000 barrels. The cost of construction represented by the capital stock of the Associated Pipe Line Company was equally divided between the Associated Oil Company and the Kern Oil & Trading Company, and under their agreement, no charge being made for the transportation of oil other than the actual cost of operation and maintenance of the pipe line, each was entitled to one half the carrying capacity of said lines, one of which was known as the Rifle line, being 281 miles in length, and the other, known as the Hot line, 138 miles in length. At all the times since the construction of these pipe lines the Kern Oil & Trading Company has devoted its one half of the carrying capacity of said lines solely and alone to the transportation of oil produced by it and delivered to its proprietary company, the Southern Pacific Company, for the sole use of the latter. In 1913 such use amounted to 19,000 barrels per day, which was one half of the full carrying capacity. The other interest in the capacity of said pipe lines so owned by the Associated Oil Company has never at any time since the construction thereof been devoted to the carrying of oil or products other than those either produced by the Associated Oil Company or purchased in the oil field by it in its business of producing, buying, and selling oil, both in crude and refined forms. In 1913 its daily production of oil amounted to 16,500 barrels, and at the same time it was purchasing about 30,000 barrels per day, which, as found by the Commission, amounted to about 22 per cent of the entire production of the state. It thus appears that one half of all the oil transported through these pipe lines was produced by the Kern Oil & Trading Company, so owned by the Southern Pacific Company, for the use of the latter, and the other half so transported was either produced or bought by the Associated Oil Company, by whom it was transported and delivered to itself at the termini of said pipe lines.

With reference to the other petitioner, Associated Oil Company: As stated, it had a daily production of 16,500 barrels and acquired by purchase 30,000 barrels per day, making a total of 46,500 barrels; hence, its one half the capacity of the Associated Pipe Line Company being only 19,000 barrels per day, left an amount for transportation by other means of 27,500 barrels, for the purpose of such transportation, it, in addition to ownership in the associated Pipe Line Company, owns a pipe line running from the oil fields to Gaviota, and one from the Coalinga field to Monterey, the capacity of each of which is some 15,000 barrels per day. At no time since the construction thereof has the Associated Oil Company transported any oil through either of these pipe lines, save and except such as it produced, together with that so purchased in the field and transported for delivery to itself at the termini of said pipe lines, where it was sold to consumers in its crude or refined form, or reshipped to other points for sale to consumers. The only efficient means of transporting oil from the San Joaquin valley oil fields, which in July, 1913, as found by the Commission, amounted to some 6,500,000 barrels, was by means of pipe lines of the petitioners and those of a number of other companies engaged in the transportation of oil, all of which product, except that produced by the Kern Oil & Trading Company and Associated Oil Company, together with the 30,000 barrels per day purchased by said last-named company, was transported through and by means of such other independent pipe lines in which petitioners had no interest.

We are unable to perceive anything in the facts established which does not compel the conclusion that petitioners were engaged in a purely private business of transporting oil through these pipe lines. Respondent lays great stress upon a decision of the United States Supreme Court entitled United States Pipe Line Cases v. Ohio Oil Co. 234 U. S. 548, 58 L. ed. 1459, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 956. To our minds, there are many features of this case which clearly distinguish it from that at bar. In the Ohio Oil Co. Case it appears that the Standard Oil Company had acquired control of all pipe lines to which the oil fields east of California were tributary, thus giving it a monopoly of the means of transportation; that a part of the pipe lines constituting the system were in fact common carriers. Having thus made itself master of the fields without the necessity of owning them or producing any oil itself, it, through its subordinates, refused to carry oil unless the same was sold to it, or to its subsidiaries and through them to it, on terms dictated by itself. It was there held that since, subject to such condition of sale to it, the company carried everybody's oil to market, the act of Congress declaring the pipe lines so operated to be common carriers was not a taking of the property for the use of the public, since, upon the facts found, such pipe lines had been by the owners thereof devoted to public use. In the case at bar a large part of the oil transported through the pipe lines by the Associated Oil Company is produced by it. The amount of 30,000 barrels per day purchased bears a comparatively small proportion to that produced in the oil fields tributary to its lines. The fact of such limited purchase, in competition with a number of other oil pipe line companies to which said oil field is tributary, cannot, under the opinion in the Ohio Oil Company Case, however interpreted, be deemed to constitute it a common carrier, or engaged in transporting oil for the public. Indeed, the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of United States v. Uncle Sam Oil Co., found in the same book (page 561), is authority for holding the contrary view. The fact that "the business is such that the public needs the use in the same, and that the conduct of the same is a matter of consequence," as found by the Commission, is immaterial to the question. In one of the so-called elevator cases, that of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, it is said: "When, therefore, one devotes his property to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in that use, and must submit to be controlled by the public for the common good, to the extent of the interest he has thus created."

But so long as he uses his property for private use, and in the absence of devoting it to public use, the public has no interest therein which entitles it to a voice in its control. Other cases to the same effect are: Budd v. New York, 143 U. S. 517, 36 L. ed. 247, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 45, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 468; Weems S. B. Co. v. Peoples' S. B. Co. 214 U. S. 345, 53 L. ed. 1024, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 661, 16 Ann. Cas. 1222; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 336, 37 L. ed. 471, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622; and Del Mar Water, Light & P. Co. v. Eshleman, 167 Cal. 666, 140 Pac. 591, 948. Indeed, our attention is directed to no authority in this state or elsewhere holding otherwise.

Subdivision (d) of § 1 embraces everyone "owning, using, operating, managing or controlling, directly or indirectly, or participating in the ownership, use, operation, management or control, directly or indirectly, under lease, contract of purchase, agreement to buy and sell, or other contractual or tacit agreement or arrangement of any kind or character whatsoever, of any pipe line, or pipe lines, or any part of any pipe line, or pipe lines, plant or equipment, or pipe line system, or any part of any pipe line system, for the transportation of crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof, of and from, or of, or from any oil field or place of production within the state of California, to any distributing, refining, or marketing center or reshipping point therefor within said state, whereby, or under, or through which, directly or indirectly, such corporation, or any corporation or association of corporations, or individual or association of individuals secures, or is enabled to secure, or attempts to secure, or tends to secure, the control of, or monopoly of the purchasing of, or the control of, or monopoly of the transportation of such crude oil, petroleum or the products thereof."

As bringing petitioners within this provision of the act, the Commission found that "the purpose of chapter 327 of the Laws of 1913 is to terminate and prevent a monopoly in the oil pipe line business," and found as a fact that the Associated Oil Company and Associated Pipe Line Company, together with three other companies named as engaged in like business, "have secured the control and monopoly of the transportation of crude oil, petroleum, and the products thereof from the San Joaquin valley oil fields," and that, while § 5 of the act excepts from the provisions thereof companies, individuals, and associations the nature and extent of whose business is not of public interest or consequence, "the five companies (among which were petitioners) serving the San Joaquin valley fields cannot be regarded as coming within the exception," and further found as a fact that the nature and extent of the business of said five companies, including petitioners, "is such that the public needs no use in the same, and the conduct of the same is not a matter of public consequence."

The finding as to the control and monopoly secured by petitioners is attacked upon the ground of insufficiency of evidence to support the same. The evidence touching the subject is most meager and unsatisfactory. In effect it shows that five companies, including petitioners, operating pipe lines in transporting oil, a part of which was produced by each of them, were also buyers of crude oil in the fields from the independent producers thereof, who, since none of said companies transported oil other than that produced by themselves or such as they acquired by purchase, had no efficient means of shipping their oil to market, and hence contracted to sell the same to some one of those companies at prices agreed upon; that there was no agreement, tacit or otherwise, shown to exist between the companies as to the price which they should pay in contracting for the purchase of oil; that during most of the time the production of oil was largely in excess of the demand therefor, and little, if any, difference was paid by the companies in contracting for the purchase of oil; hence convenience and economy in delivery of the oil both as to the purchaser and buyer might well be deemed a controlling factor in making such contracts. While the position of petitioners and owners of the other pipe lines gave them, as found by the Commission, an advantage over the independent producers in transporting their product, thus affording an opportunity enabling them to enter into an unlawful combination in restraint of trade, our attention is directed to no evidence which in the slightest degree tends to establish such fact.

However this may be, and conceding the evidence ample to support the finding, such fact cannot warrant the taking of private property for public use without compensation, for which no provision is made or contemplated. True, the exaction of tolls for actual service will be allowed, but there are elements of damage due to the subjection of the property to the public service not covered by charges for service performed for which no compensation is made. That subjecting petitioners' property to the use of the public as common carriers constitutes a taking of the same, admits of no controversy. "Whenever a law deprives the owner of the beneficial use and free enjoyment of his property, or imposes restraints upon such use and enjoyment that materially affect its value, without legal process or compensation, it deprives him of his property within the meaning of the Constitution.

. . . It is not necessary, in order to render a statute obnoxious to the restraints of the Constitution, that it must in terms or in effect authorize an actual physical taking of the property or the thing itself, so long as it affects its free use and enjoyment, or the power of disposition at the will of the owner." Forster v. Scott, 136 N. Y. 577, 18 L.R.A. 543, 32 N. E. 976; Monongahela Nav. Co. v. United States, 148 U. S. 312, 37 L. ed. 463, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 622.

Under the Public Utilities Act the Railroad Commission, as an instrumentality of the state, is authorized to supervise and regulate every public utility in the state, with power to fix tolls and charges exacted for the service performed; but it has not power to declare what shall constitute a public utility. But this, argues respondent, is a function of the legislature. Not so. The legislature possesses no such power. It cannot by its edict make that a public utility which in fact is not, and take private property for public use by its fiat that the property is being devoted to a public use. If, under the broad language used in § 23, art. 12, of the Constitution, that "every class of private corporations, individuals or associations of individuals hereafter declared by the legislature to be public utilities shall . . . be subject to . . . control and regulation" of the Railroad Commission, the legislature can by its mere fiat, without notice or opportunity to be heard, and in the absence of any provision for compensating the owner thereof for damage, subject petitioners' pipe lines to the demands of the public because the private use thereof tends to create a monopoly or enables the owner thereof to secure a monopoly, it can with equal propriety declare a grocer or dry goods store employing more than a specified number of clerks to be a public utility, or, without such or any qualifications, declare that all pipe lines used in transporting oil shall be common carriers of oil. Indeed, as to corporations, this is precisely what it has attempted to do by § 2 of the act, which provides that every corporation owning a pipe line through and by means of which it transports oil is declared to be a common carrier and subject to the provisions of the Public Utilities Act; the only limitation therein being, as provided in § 5, that it shall not apply where the nature and extent of the business is such that the public needs no use in the same. That such provisions constitute a taking of private property by the state for public use, without due process of law, which is prohibited by the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, must be conceded. Mr. Lewis, in his work on Eminent Domain, 3d ed. § 11, says: "A law which authorizes the taking of private property without compensation . . . cannot be considered as due process of law in a free government." Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Chicago, 166 U. S. 226, 41 L. ed. 979, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 581.

1. The evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that petitioners, in operating their pipe lines in transporting oil, came within the provisions of subdivisions (a), (b), and (c) of § 1 of the act.

2. Subdivision (d) of § 1 and § 2 of the act are, except, perhaps, as to corporations acquiring such pipe lines after the passage thereof, unconstitutional and in violation of the 14th Amendment to the Federal Constitution, in that they contemplate the taking of private property in the absence of any provision made for compensating the owners, and without due process of law.

Our conclusion renders it unnecessary to consider other grounds upon which petitioners attack the action of the Railroad Commission.

The orders, in so far as they affect petitioners, are annulled.

Annotation—Pipe line companies as public utilities.

A search has disclosed but two cases on this question in addition to ASSOCIATED PIPE LINE CO. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION, ante, 849.

Whether or not a pipe line is a public utility or common carrier subject to regulation by the Public Service Commission or the Interstate Commerce Commission seems to depend upon the method of operation; that is, whether it is operated for the benefit of the public, for hire, or whether it is operated for purely private purposes.

Thus, in Pipe Line Cases (United States v. Ohio Oil Co.) (1914) 234 U. S. 548, 58 L. ed. 1459, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 956, it was held that oil companies controlling interstate pipe lines in which is carried all oil offered between the oil fields east of California and the Atlantic seaboard upon condition that the offerer shall first sell the oil to them on practically their own terms are carriers, subject to the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, within the meaning of the statute (Act of June 29, 1906, 34 Stat. at L. 584, chap. 3591, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 8563) extending the operation of the Interstate Commerce Act to persons or corporations engaged in the transportation of oil by means of pipe lines, "who shall be considered and held to be common carriers within the meaning and purpose of this act." The court said: "The provisions of the act are to apply to any person engaged in the transportation of oil by means of pipe lines. The words 'who the will is precisely like that in the instant case. But, as we have said before, decisions construing other wills are not always helpful, because the language used is not the same.

Plaintiffs' contention is that by the use of the words "fee simple" the will gave an absolute title, and that the subsequent provision is repugnant. Appellees say that the use of the words "fee simple" was ill advised, but contend that this cannot have the effect of extending the term providing for a life estate. Cases are cited by the parties as to general rules of construction, about which there seems to be no dispute. Cases are cited to the effect that, if there is irreconcilable repugnancy between two clauses, the last expression controls, and that mere ambiguity will not convert into a fee-simple estate what would otherwise be plainly a life estate, and that the failure of the will to devise the remainder cannot control the provision of the will giving only a life estate; also, that the fact that the widow may never marry will not enlarge the estate to a fee; and it is conceded by both that the intent of the testator controls, and that all parts of the will must be given force if possible.

Referring first to plaintiffs' contention. They say that the words following the words "fee simple" in paragraph 2 are merely precatory and an expression of desire on the part of the testator,—that he does not desire his wife's remarriage,—and that said last clause is repugnant. They cite to sustain their contention, among other cases, Re Burbank, 69 Iowa, 381, 28 N. W. 648; Rona v. Meier, 47 Iowa, 609, 29 Am. Rep. 493; Alden v. Johnson, 63 Iowa, 125, 18 N. W. 696; Killmer v. Wuchner, 74 Iowa, 359, 37 N. W. 778; Pellizzarro v. Reppert, 83 Iowa, 498, 50 N. W. 19; Halliday v. Stickler, 78 Iowa, 388, 43 N. W. 228; Law v. Douglass, 107 Iowa, 608, 78 N. W. 212; Re Barrett, 111 Iowa, 570, 82 N. W. 998; Williams v. Allison, 33 Iowa, 278; Podaril v. Clark, 118 Iowa, 264, 91 N. W. 1091; Channell v. Aldinger, 121 Iowa, 297, 96 N. W. 781; Meyer v. Weiler, 121 Iowa, 51, 95 N. W. 254; Reichauer v. Born, 151 Iowa, 456, 131 N. W. 705. They also refer to Simpkins v. Bales, 123 Iowa, 62, 98 N. W. 580, and say of it that there, by the express terms of the will, the widow took a life estate in the property of her deceased husband, with power of disposal during her life or widowhood, and that, having conveyed by deed within that period, title passed to the grantee named in the deed. And appellants say that that case differs from the one now before us in this respect: That Simpkins provided in his will that the remainder of his property left at the time of his wife's death, or the termination of her widowhood, should descend to his children and heirs at law, which is not true in the instant case. This may have some bearing, but we think it is not controlling for the reason that, in the instant case, if the widow takes but a life estate, the heirs would take the remainder upon her death or remarriage.

We shall not attempt to again review the cases cited and relied upon by appellants. They are cases where there was an absolute grant and an attempt thereafter to place limitations thereon and which were repugnant thereto, or where there was power of disposition, and the like.

For appellees it is said that it has been held in another jurisdiction that a devise to one "while she remains the widow of John McGuire, deceased, in fee simple," gave only a life estate, citing McGuire's Appeal, 8 Sadler (Pa.) 177, 11 Atl. 72. An examination of that case shows that it was an action to compel specific performance of a contract to convey certain land in fee simple, and the purchaser refused to take the deed, contending that plaintiff was not the owner in fee. The trial court held that the widow took but a life estate, and the supreme court of Pennsylvania said that it was inclined to think that, under the will, she took but a life estate; but the court said further that her estate was no more than a conditional fee, hence liable to expire on breach of the condition, and that such was not the kind of a fee that was contracted for, and that the court rightly refused to compel the payment of the purchase money. Appellees cite also Price v. Elwell, 169 Iowa, 206, 151 N. W. 79, and Smith v. Runnels, 97 Iowa, 55, 65 N. W. 1002, and say of them that the language used in the wills there construed was as comprehensive as the term "fee simple," and the court held the devise to be only a life estate. But we think the language of the wills in the cases cited is not as broad as in the instant case. In the Smith Case, the will gave plaintiff all the estate of the testator for her sole use and benefit "during her natural life," afterwards to be divided. In the Price Case, the will provided, substantially, that the wife of testator was to have and to hold in her exclusive right so long as she remained unmarried, and in case of her marriage she was to have one third, and the remainder to be divided equally among his children, and on her death before a division the estate should be divided equally among the children; it was held that this gave the wife a life estate only. But we think the language there used was not as broad as in the instant case. That case reviews many of the cases relied upon by appellees which will be referred to in a moment.

It is quite generally held that a devise to the widow so long as she remains the widow devises but a life estate. Appellees cite, to sustain this proposition, Brunk v. Brunk, 157 Iowa, 51, 137 N. W. 1065; Archer v. Barnes, 149 Iowa, 658, 128 N. W. 969; Mohn v. Mohn, 148 Iowa, 288, 126 N. W. 1127; Koonz v. Hempy, 142 Iowa, 337, 120 N. W. 976; Shaw v. Shaw, 115 Iowa, 193, 88 N. W. 327. But in none of these cases was the language as broad as in the instant case. Doubtless the last clause, standing alone, would give a life estate only, but it must be construed in connection with the words preceding "fee simple." Of course, if the last clause gives a life estate only, and the preceding words a fee simple, that would devise a fee-simple life estate, which is impossible.

Under the will being now reviewed, giving effect to all the language used, we think it is not subject to serious doubt that testator wished his wife to remain unmarried, and that he gave her a fee title if she did not remarry, and that the devise was subject to be defeated in case she did.

Definitions for a qualified or defeasible fee are found at 16 Cyc. 602, and notes. It is there said, in substance, that it is a fee which has a qualification subjoined thereto, and which must be determined whenever the qualification annexed to it is at an end. The estate is a fee, because by a possibility it may endure forever in a man and his heirs; yet, as that duration depends upon the concurrence of collateral circumstances, which qualify and debase the purity of the donation, it is therefore a qualified or base fee. During its continuance such a fee has all the incidents of a fee simple. The owner of such a fee cannot alone convey a perfect title to the property, and if he conveys in fee the determinable quality of the estate follows the transfer.

It is said in Hall v. Turner, 110 N. C. 292, 14 S. E. 791, that the terms "determinable fee," "base fee," and "qualified fee" are now used indiscriminately, although some authorities have made distinctions in their application.

Appellant cites Busby v. Busby, 137 Iowa, 57, 114 N. W. 559, in addition to the cases before referred to. We refer to this case at this point because it may be thought to be in some respects similar to the case being now reviewed, and it was there held that the widow took a fee title. In the first paragraph of the Busby will, the homestead is devised by the testator to his wife, and in that paragraph there are no words of limitation. The determination of that case was not placed upon the ground, as we understand it, that the first paragraph devised an absolute fee and that subsequent provisions of the will were repugnant and for that reason inoperative. There were numerous other provisions of the will, and, taking it all together, for the reasons given in the opinion and referred to again in the case of Price v. Ewell, supra, the widow took a fee title. But the question as to whether she took an absolute or fee-simple title, or a qualified title, was not discussed or determined. It is said by Mr. Justice Bishop, who wrote the opinion, at page 61 of 137 Iowa: "Now it is well settled in the authorities that a devise by a testator to his widow, conditioned only against remarriage, carries title—in fee if real estate, and absolute if personal property—which is descendible to her heirs on her death; the condition having been faithfully observed."

It may be thought that this statement is not strictly accurate, in view of our other holdings, in the cases before cited, that it is generally held that such a devise is only a life estate. We think it is true, where, as in the instant case, the will devises a fee-simple title to the widow provided she remains unmarried, it does devise a fee. And such we think was the meaning by Mr. Justice Bishop in his statement just quoted, for he cites, to sustain his proposition, Becker v. Becker, 206 Ill. 53, 69 N. E. 49; Redding v. Rice, 171 Pa. 301, 33 Atl. 330; Squier v. Harvey, 16 R. I. 226, 14 Atl. 862; 1 Underhill, Wills, §§ 506, 507. An examination of these cases shows that in every one of them, while it was held that a fee was created, it was a qualified or defeasible fee, and not a fee-simple title. Thus, in the Becker Case the provisions of the will were, substantially, that testator devised all of his realty to his wife, and, with the exception of certain specific bequests, bequeathed to her all his personalty, declaring that she was to have full charge of the estate, without any restriction of any nature, and further provides that she was never to marry again, and that if she did his estate was to be divided equally between her and his brothers, did not reduce the fee theretofore given to a life estate. The court said: "The estate taken by the appellee widow is a fee, because, in the absence of remarriage, it will endure forever in her and her heirs. The restriction against her remarriage qualifies her estate, and it is therefore a qualified or base fee. Until determined by her remarriage, she has the same rights and privileges over the estate as if it were a fee simple absolute, save that the determinable quality of the estate will follow any conveyance thereof by her. [Citing cases.] It did not appear from the bill that the appellant had any present interest in the real estate. The contingency upon which he may succeed to an interest in the real estate has not happened and may never happen."

In the Redding Case testator gave his property to his widow "for her own proper use and behoof, as long as she shall remain my widow, and if she should get married then she shall be only entitled to the one third in said property, the balance, being two thirds to my youngest daughter, K., and if the said K. should die, then I will and bequeath the two thirds to my son, W., and if both should die then the residue remaining shall be equally divided among my remaining children." Held, that the whole estate was given to the widow in fee, subject to the condition that she should not marry again, and defeasible as to two thirds upon the breach of that condition.

In the Squier Case testator gave to his wife all his estate, real and personal, with certain exceptions, forever, as long as she should remain his widow, but in case she should marry again he gave all his real estate to J. Held, that the widow took the entire estate, after the payment of debts and legacies, subject to defeasance by her marriage.

In Underhill on Wills, cited by Judge Bishop (§ 506), it is said, among other things: "The limitation by the testator of an estate in lands to his widow during widowhood, or, in express terms, 'while she remains a widow,' 'as long as she remains unmarried,' 'until her marriage,' or in any similar language, is unquestionably valid. Such a limitation is not regarded as in restraint of marriage. The testator has an interest in providing that his widow shall not remarry. Nor is it at all inconsistent with public policy to restrain second marriages under all circumstances, however much it may be advisable to promote marriage in general. In many cases the testator leaves young children who must be cared for by someone; and what person can be more competent to attend to their moral culture, rearing, and education than their mother? . . . Hence, whether we regard the estate during widowhood as an estate upon limitation, or as an estate upon condition subsequent restraining remarriage, it is unquestionably valid in either case. Nor is it material that there is no gift over upon the remarriage of the widow."

And it is said in § 507 of the same work: "If the testator gives his widow an estate during widowhood, or if he gives her in express terms an estate during her life, which is to cease on her remarriage, and she takes under his will, she has no cause to complain that on her remarriage she loses L.R.A.1918C.

the estate which was given her conditionally. On her remarriage the estate absolutely ceases and goes to the devisee over or to the heirs or next of kin of the testator.

. . . No rule of law prevents the testator from giving her a fee simple in lieu of dower which shall be defeasible and shall go to others on her remarriage. . . . If she conveys the fee, her grantee takes it also subject to being defeated by her remarriage; but, if she dies without having remarried, the fee descends to her heirs and the devise over is defeated."

In Cummings v. Lohr, 246 Ill. 577, 92 N. E. 970, the will devised and bequeathed to testator's wife all the realty and personalty of which he might die seised, "provided she remains my widow, but should she marry, then all the property shall go to my children that are alive," except a life estate in one third of the land. It was held that the widow took a conditional or base fee, subject to be terminated by her marriage. That case was made to turn, in part at least, upon a statute of Illinois, which provides that "every estate in lands which shall be granted, conveyed or devised, although other words heretofore necessary to transfer an estate of inheritance be not added, shall be deemed in a fee-simple estate of inheritance, if a less estate be not limited by express words, or do not appear to have been granted, conveyed or devised by construction or operation of law."

We have a statute somewhat similar as to conveyances. Code, § 2914.

In the Cummings Case the court said: "The words of the devise are sufficient to pass the fee to the widow, and the proviso merely annexes a condition which converts the fee simple into a conditional or base fee, subject to be terminated by her marriage. . . . The will gave to the widow a qualified fee in all the land of which the testator died seised, subject to be terminated by her marriage. The plaintiff in error has no present estate in any of the land, but only an expectancy. No estate will vest in her except in the event of the marriage of Louisa Lohr. . . . There can be no partition of an expectancy, and the appeal should therefore have been dismissed."

In McFarland v. McFarland, 177 Ill. 208, 52 N. E. 281, it was held that a will devising testator's estate, without words of limitation, and subject to a personal charge, to be held and enjoyed by the devisees indefinitely, unless they desired to terminate their interest, which they could do by a written instrument signed by at least two of them, passes an estate in fee and determinable only in the manner prescribed.

We are of opinion that under these authorities and the Becker, Redding, and Squier Cases, supra, the widow, under the will in question, took a fee, but that it is a defeasible fee. Without taking the time or space to review further cases so holding, the following cases may be cited: Fidelity Trust Co. v. Bobloski, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1093, and note (228 Pa. 52, 76 Atl. 720), 40 Cyc. 1593,—where it is said a devise to a woman which is absolute, except for a provision against marriage, creates a qualified or defeasible fee, subject to be divested only by her marriage, citing a large number of cases. See also Re Biles, 88 Misc. 452, 151 N. Y. Supp. 1097.

In the case of Cummings v. Lohr, supra, the court distinguished between the words "provided" and "while," saying that "while" is merely an adverb expressing duration, and that "provided" is an apt word to express a condition. The will in the instant case uses the words, "'so long' as she will be my widow and not marie again." But in the McFarland Case, supra, devisees were to hold the property "so long as they shall carry on and conduct the business for which the real estate above mentioned is peculiarly and particularly adapted, viz., the care and treatment of the insane." And, as before stated, it was there held that the estate taken was a defeasible fee. The words are the same as in the instant case. See also, on this point, 1 Underhill on Wills, § 506, from which we have before quoted, where the words "while," "as long," "until," etc., are used.

We are of opinion that the trial court correctly construed the will as giving to the widow a defeasible fee, and that such holding ought to be and it is affirmed. But, though the point is not made, under the circumstances, we think the judgment should be without prejudice to the right of defendants to relitigate their claim to their share in the remainder in case the widow should remarry. The judgment should likewise be without prejudice to plaintiffs to relitigate their claim to the property as grantees of the widow should she die without remarrying, should their title be questioned. It may not be necessary for us to preserve such rights, because only questions presented are adjudicated, and we do not in this case determine the rights of plaintiffs under their deeds in case the widow dies without a remarriage, or the rights of defendants should she remarry. Under the authorities, some of which have been quoted, the parties have no present interest in the real estate. Whether they ever will depends on the question as to whether the widow does or does not remarry.

Affirmed.

Annotation—Effect of testamentary provision restricting widow to enjoyment during widowhood, upon quantum of estate taken by her.

The question above stated forms the subject of a note in 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1093, to which the present annotation is supplementary.

As stated in the earlier note, the fundamental inquiry upon the result of which the quantum of estate taken under any particular devise or bequest must depend, is whether the event of not marrying is interwoven into the gift itself so as to create an estate during widowhood only, or whether it is a condition annexed to the gift upon the breach of which the estate given is to be divested and determined. In as much as the intent of the testator, gathered from his general scheme of disposition as well as from accompanying circumstances, rather than the language employed by him, controls, no general rule can be laid down by which the quantum of the estate devised in any given case may be ascertained.

Like the earlier note, the present note does not include cases in which a L.R.A.1918C.

limitation over in event of subsequent marriage has been held void as repugnant to the estate primarily devised; nor does it include cases in which, although the testamentary provision under construction restricts the widow to enjoyment during widowhood, the extent of her estate is determined by the power of disposition annexed to the gift.

Qualified or determinable fee.

In Cummings v. Lohr (1910) 246 Ill. 577, 92 N. E. 970, it was held that under a will devising the testator's real estate to his wife "provided she remains my widow, but should she marry, then all the property shall go to my children that are alive, except one third of the land which she is to have during her lifetime," the widow took a conditional or base fee subject to be terminated by her marriage.

In Lehfart v. Scharre (1911) 143 Ky. 849, 137 S. W. 775, testator gave his residuary estate to his wife, "with full power to sell and convey the same or any part thereof . . . and she may dispose of my property by will. If my wife should marry again then in that event her right to sell and convey my real or personal estate or dispose of the same by will shall cease and she shall only have a life estate," and further appointed her as executrix with full power to sell and convey any and all of the property for reinvestment or otherwise. It was held that, reading the above provisions together and gathering from them the intention of the testator, his purpose was to invest her with the fee in the event she did not marry.

In Hinkle v. Hinkle (1916) 168 Ky. 286, 181 S. W. 1116, where testator gave all his residuary estate, both real and personal, to his wife, "to be hers to hold, use and control and to be responsible to no one for her management as long as she shall remain my widow. Should she desire to marry again, before such marriage I want my estate as it shall then be found to be regularly administered under the laws of Kentucky by a competent appointee of the court," it was held that, in view of the language employed and of the fact that there was no limitation over unless the wife should marry again, she took a defeasible fee, subject to be defeated by her marriage, and converted into a life estate in one third of the real property.

In Gaven v. Allen (1889) 100 Mo. 293, 13 S. W. 501, where testator devised to his wife certain real estate and personal property, adding: "And my will is and I desire that if my said wife, Ellen Gaven, should happen to get married at any time after my death, the above-mentioned property or any money or property hereafter mentioned shall be divided share and share alike between all or any of my children then living," it was held that the wife took a base or qualified fee.

In Weiss v. Mt. Vernon (1913) 157 App. Div. 383, 142 N. Y. Supp. 250, affirmed without opinion in 215 N. Y. 657, 109 N. E. 1095, where testator gave all his property to his widow, with "authority to sell, convey, and mortgage," adding: "She shall have and enjoy the same and the proceeds and profits thereof as long as she shall remain my widow. But in case she should marry again, then she shall only have and be entitled to such a share as is now provided by the statute,"—it was held that L.R.A.1918C.

In Hults v. Holzbach (1911) 233 Pa. 367, 82 Atl. 469, where testator bequeathed to his wife all his real and personal estate so long as she should remain his widow, providing that in case she should marry again she should have certain property and the balance should go to the testator's six sisters, it was held that there was nothing in the will to justify an inference that the testator intended his wife to have merely a life estate, but that the estate granted was a fee, determinable upon remarriage; the court further supporting its conclusion by the argument that, as there was no suggestion of a devise over of the whole estate after the death of the widow in case she did not remarry, the result of holding that the fee was not in her would be an intestacy.

In Weymouth's Will (1917) 165 Wis. 455, 161 N. W. 373, where testator provided: "It is my wish that all of my property go to my wife, Elizabeth Weymouth, so long as she shall remain single. In case of her marriage she shall have the homestead [describing it] and one third of all other property after all debts and accounts are paid, and the balance to go to my brothers and sisters," it was held that, in view of the provisions of a statute that every devise of land shall be construed to convey all the estate unless it clearly appears that the testator intended to convey a lesser estate, the wife took not a life estate, but a fee absolute, subject to be divested by remarriage.

Estate during widowhood.

In Hawks v. Smith (1914) 141 Ga. 422, 81 S. E. 200, it was held that under a will by which testator declared that all of his property should remain in the care of his wife for her use and support, and for the use and support of his children during the life or widowhood of the wife, and that at the death or marriage of his wife all the testator's property should be divided among his lawful heirs, the wife took an estate for life or during widowhood.

In Belt v. Gay (1914) 142 Ga. 366, 82 S. E. 1071, it was held that under a will by which testator devised to his wife the whole of his estate, real and personal, "during her widowhood, to be as absolutely under her control and management as it now is under my own, being perfectly willing to trust my children to her care and bounty. In the event of the marriage of my said wife after my death, then I wish my property to be divided equally among her and my children who may then be in life, share and share alike, including the natural increase of the slaves but not the income of the property during her widowhood, it being my express intention that she shall not be held to account for any income or for any alleged waste or mismanagement. Should my said wife remain in widowhood during the term of her natural life, she is to have the same control, management and interest in the property as above specified until her death at which time I will and direct that it be divided equally share and share alike, among my then surviving children and the children (if any) of such as may have died before her, the latter to take per stirpes to them and their heirs forever,"—the widow of the testator took no greater estate than one for life, subject to be terminated by her marriage.

In Cowman v. Glos (1912) 255 Ill. 377, 99 N. E. 586, it was held that a devise to testator's widow so long as she remains unmarried, and in case she should remarry, one third to go to her and the remainder to testator's children, gave the widow a life estate only, subject to be terminated by her marriage.

In Rumsey v. Durham (1854) 5 Ind. 71, it was held that under a will by which testator gave his wife "as long as she remains my widow, the use and benefit of all my real and personal property for the support of herself and family," further providing that after her death or remarriage the property should be sold and equally divided among testator's children, the widow evidently took a life estate.

In Hibbits v. Jack (1884) 97 Ind. 570, 49 Am. Rep. 478, it was held that under a devise to testator's wife "so long as she shall remain my widow," of all testator's property, the widow took at most an estate for life.

In Brunk v. Brunk (1912) 157 Iowa, 51, 137 N. W. 1065, where a will provided: "I will all my real estate and personal property to my wife, Elizabeth Brunk, while she remains my widow.

. . . If she should fail to be my widow during her lifetime, she is to have one third of all my real estate and personal property, and the balance is to be divided equally between my children," it was held that the widow took only a life estate, subject to the condition with reference to marriage, the court saying: "The language of the first paragraph is not broader in its effect than a devise to the widow for life or during widowhood. She could not remain his widow after her death, and the devise therefore conferred upon her no estate which could pass by inheritance."

In Price v. Ewell (1915) 169 Iowa, 206, 151 N. W. 79, it was held that under a devise to testator's wife of certain realty and of his residuary estate, "to have and to hold in her exclusive right so long as she shall remain unmarried," and disposing of the estate in case of her marriage or decease, the widow took only a life estate, subject to be terminated by her remarriage.

In Best v. Best (1889) 88 Ky. 569, 11 S. W. 600, testator gave all his property to his wife, adding: "I desire that all the property, real and personal and mixed, be under the control and desire of my said wife, and to be managed by her as she may wish. Should my wife intermarry, then I desire that she may give security for all property remaining on hand for the purpose of protecting my children, and, should she remain unmarried, at her death I desire that all the property remaining be divided equally with my children [naming them] share and share alike," and appointed her as executrix, to act without giving security. It was held that the provision quoted so far qualified what would otherwise have been regarded as an absolute estate as to make it, according to the evident intention of the testator, an estate for life or during widowhood, though with a power of disposal for the support of the widow and children.

In Morgan v. Christian (1911) 142 Ky. 14, 133 S. W. 982, testator by an artificially drawn will provided: "I will my wife, Sarah B. Tanner," certain real and personal property, concluding: "She also can hold this entire property or depts or depts this is my will so long as she remains my widow, and if she marries, the lower tract of land will be equal divided between the boys and Lizzie Tanner home farm." It was held that it was clearly testator's intention that the widow should take, not a fee, but a life estate, subject to be terminated or defeated by her marrying again.

In Mason v. Tuell (1914) 161 Ky. 392, 170 S. W. 950, where testator gave all his property, both real and personal, to his wife, "to use and manage as she thinks best as long as she shall remain unmarried and my widow. I hereby give to her the full power and authority to sell any or all of my real estate at private or public sale and invest the proceeds as she may deem best for the interest of my family; but on her decease or marriage, any property remaining I give and devise to my children and their heirs respectively," it was held that as the power of disposition given to the wife was not general, but limited, she did not take a fee, but only a life estate in the property devised.

In Nash v. Simpson (1886) 78 Me. 142, 3 Atl. 53, where testator devised to his wife all his real estate, "to remain hers so long as she shall remain unmarried after my decease, but if she shall marry again, then from that time she shall be entitled to and receive only one third part of all that remains," it was held that the widow took a life estate only, and not a fee, although there was no devise over.

In Tapley v. Douglass (1915) 113 Me. 392, 94 Atl. 486, where testator made the following bequest: "I will and bequeath to Hattie R. Douglass $2,000 in money" and certain personal property, "to have and use so long as she shall remain the widow of Jeremiah Douglass," it was held that the legatee had only a life estate in the money and other property mentioned in the bequest to her, determinable upon her marrying again.

In Hale v. Neilson (1916) 112 Miss. 291, 72 So. 1011 (suggestion of error denied in (1916) 113 Miss. 29, 73 So. 865), where testator provided:

"Item 2. I devise and bequeath all of my estate, both real and personal to my beloved wife, to have, to hold and enjoy the same as long as she continues my widow.

"Item 3. It is my will and I so direct that in the event of the marriage of my widow, that she retain to her own separate use, benefit and behoof, one half of my said estate, both real and personal, during her natural life, and upon her death, should she leave surviving her any child, or children or descendants of them, I devise and bequeath to such child or children or descendants of them the said half so to be retained by my wife during her natural life, but should she die not leaving any child or children or descendants of them I bequeath and devise said last mentioned half to the persons hereinafter mentioned in the 4th item of this will, to be divided among them in the proportion therein provided for the division of said half to be given up by my wife upon marriage as aforesaid.

"Item 4. In the event of the marriage of my widow, I devise and bequeath one half of my estate, both real and personal, to the following persons, in the following proportions, to wit, one fifth of said half each to my sisters, Annie F. Symons and Catherine C. Hopkins, my niece, Annie Little, my nephew, Walker Neilson; and one tenth of said half each to my nephews, William Covington and Benjamin Covington, to have and to hold unto themselves and their respective heirs in fee simple.

"Item 5. It is the full meaning and intent of this my last will and testament that my beloved wife shall hold and enjoy all of my estate during her widowhood, in case she marries, that one half of my estate be divided and disposed of among my said sisters, niece, and nephews as specified and directed in item 4 of this will; that my wife retain during her natural life the other half of my estate, and that in case my wife die leaving a child or children or their descendants surviving her the last mentioned half of my estate shall be divided between my said sisters, niece, and nephews in the same manner and proportions as directed in said item 4 of this will for the division of said half so to be given up by my wife in case of her marriage," it was held that the will, taken as a whole, showed that it was testator's intention to give his widow not a conditional fee, but at best a mere life estate.

In Worley v. Wimberly (1915) 99 Neb. 20, 154 N. W. 849, where a testator who, when his will was drawn and at his death had a wife and three children, the objects of his bounty, made the following disposition: "Second 2. I give and bequeath to my beloved wife, Eliza Jane Worley, all of my real estate (describing it). Third 3. And all the personal property of every description whatsoever moneys notes bankable paper of every description belonging to me at my death. Fourth 4th. And the said Eliza Jane Worley my beloved wife is to have the use of all lands and personal property so long as she lives or remains my widow but if she should marry then all property both real and personal shall be divided up equally between the children and at any time the property is divided and each child shall choose one man each and they shall divide the property equally and if the said Eliza Jane Worley wants to help any one of the children she can do so and it be charged up to their estate and taken out at final settlement,"—it was held that the widow did not take a fee, but only a life estate.

In Schminke v. Sinclair (1916) 100 Neb. 101, 158 N. W. 458, where testator provided: "I devise and bequeath all the estate and effects, whatsoever and wheresoever, both real and personal, to which I may be entitled or which I may have power to dispose of at my decease, unto my dear and beloved wife Anna Schminke so long as she shall continue my widow and unmarried; and in the event of her marriage or death I devise and bequeath the same to my children to be divided between them as nearly as may be possible in equal shares," it was held that the general and equivocal words in the first part of the will, which, standing alone, might have given the fee to the wife, were to be considered as limited by the subsequent clauses evidencing an intent to devise only a life estate.

In Fenster v. Bierman (1916) — N. J. Eq. —, 99 Atl. 529, where testator gave and devised to his wife, Flora, all his residuary estate, "to have, hold, manage, control, lease, sell, mortgage, exchange, convey and convert the same in her discretion, and to have full charge and control of same (this third provision of my will shall be in full force and effect so long as Flora does not remarry). Upon the remarriage of my wife after my death I request and direct my wife Flora to divide the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal wheresoever and whatsoever into four equal shares and to pay, make over and convey one of said shares to each of my sons here named," giving a share to each of his three children, and the fourth to the widow herself, it was held that as, by the parenthetical statement which included the third clause of his will, the testator had in express terms limited the devise to his widow to her widowhood, she took only a life interest, subject to be terminated by her remarriage.

In Pettis v. Smith (1873) 69 N. C. 3, it was held that under a will by which testator gave his wife certain real and personal property, "all of which property to be hers during her widowhood; in the event of her marriage the one third of the above property to be hers forever, and the balance to be divided among my children,"—the wife took an estate for life.

In Kemerer's Estate (1916) 251 Pa. 282, 96 Atl. 654, where testator bequeathed all his estate, real and personal, "to my beloved wife so long as she remains my widow," further providing: "After her death I direct that my property be sold, and the proceeds of my estate be divided equally, share and share alike among my children," it was held that the widow took only an estate for life or so long as she should remain unmarried, any other construction being precluded by the language employed by the testator.

In Hendricks v. Temple (1915) 101 S. C. 418, 85 S. E. 961, where testator devised certain lands to his wife "to have and to hold, to use and possess during her natural life or widowhood, but in the event she should marry or if she lives single until she dies, in either case it is my will that the above named land be sold by my executors . . . and proceeds of the sale of land be divided in the following manner: one third to her or her heirs, one third to the children of my son . . . one third to my daughter," it was held that the widow took no more than a life estate, liable to be divested upon her marriage.

has been divorced on his promise to drink no more intoxicating liquor cannot secure a divorce because of his failure to keep his promise, where, by statute, habitual drunkenness is a ground for divorce only in case the habit is formed after marriage.

III. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(February 16, 1918.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Mahaska County dismissing her petition on the merits in an action for a divorce and alimony. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Dan Davis, for appellant:

Plaintiff is entitled to a divorce on any and all the grounds alleged in the petition.

Pierce v. Pierce, 33 Iowa, 238; Douglass v. Douglass, 31 Iowa, 421; Owen v. Owen, 90 Iowa, 365, 57 N. W. 887; Day v. Day, 84 Iowa, 221, 50 N. W. 979; Taylor v. Taylor, 80 Iowa, 29, 20 Am. W. 956; Platner v. Platner, 66 Iowa, 378, 23 N. W. 764; Hart v. Hart, 74 Iowa, 487, 38 N. W. 375.

No appearance for appellee.

Preston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In her petition plaintiff asked for a divorce on three grounds: Desertion, cruel and inhuman treatment, and that he has become an habitual drunkard since the marriage.

There was no appearance in the district court for defendant, either in person or counsel, and a default was entered against him. The plaintiff's evidence was taken down by the reporter. Plaintiff was examined as a witness in her own behalf, as was her mother and another witness. There was cross-examination by the court, but very little of the cross-examination is set out in the abstract. Under the circumstances, we have thought it proper to order a transcript of the evidence in order that we may have the case as nearly as may be as it was presented to the trial court.

It appears that plaintiff had been married to another man, by whom she had five children. She has no children by the defendant. The first husband obtained a divorce from her, but the grounds are not shown in the abstract. Plaintiff had obtained a divorce from the defendant, but had remarried him. Plaintiff testifies to her husband's habits of intoxication, and there is some corroboration by other witnesses at this point, but it appears that defendant was an habitual drunkard before she married him the last time. She testified that before she married him the last time he promised her he would take the cure for the liquor habit, and that he would not drink any more, but that he was not cured, and began his drinking habits again a few days after the last marriage. Under such circumstances we think the requirements of the statute have not been met, that to entitle her to a divorce on that ground he must have become an habitual drunkard after the marriage.

Plaintiff testifies as to acts of cruelty which, if corroborated, would perhaps justify the court in granting a divorce. Some of her testimony is in the nature of conclusions, and is such that she could have no personal knowledge, such as that he hunted her with a revolver. The only evidence that could be claimed as corroboration as to the alleged cruelty is given by plaintiff's mother. The mother does not testify to having seen any acts of cruelty on the part of the defendant towards plaintiff. She says he came over to her house, as we understand it after plaintiff had gone, and that defendant had a gun, but does not testify that defendant made any attempt to use it, or what he did with it, or that any threats were made, or that plaintiff was present. So that the testimony as to this is that of the plaintiff alone, and her evidence is not entirely satisfactory. Code, § 3173, provides that no divorce shall be granted on the testimony of the plaintiff alone.

Such is the situation, too, in regard to the charge of desertion. She testifies that she left the defendant two years before the bringing of the action because of his mistreatment of her. The mother testifies in regard to the separation at about that time, but does not show that they have not lived together since. Another witness on this branch of the case testifies that plaintiff worked for her two or three months of the alleged two years' desertion, and that she had never lived with defendant since then to her knowledge. But the witness lived in the town of Washington, Iowa, and the plaintiff and defendant in another town, except the time that plaintiff worked for witness. It is not shown that the witness was so situated as to have any knowledge on the subject, except for the short time plaintiff worked for her.

Without any appearance for the defendant in the district court, or in this court, makes it an unsatisfactory way to present the case to us. The trial court had the advantage of seeing the witnesses. It is our conclusion that the showing is not sufficient to justify a divorce. We have examined the transcript, which shows some other matters than those referred to, and which strengthens our conclusion that the record does not present a case for reversal. Indeed, taking the entire record, it is clearly manifest that plaintiff did not show herself entitled to a divorce.

Though it does not appear in the abstract, the transcript shows that after plaintiff obtained a divorce from her first husband she married one Arnold. She was indicted with Arnold for a crime, but was acquitted. Arnold was convicted, and she obtained a divorce from him, and she then married again. It is not quite clear, but, as we gather from the record and from the cross-examination of plaintiff by the court, plaintiff also obtained a divorce from one Rish-miller on the ground of desertion. At any rate, plaintiff testifies that she has been married four times, but to only three men. It appears, too, that in December, 1916, she attempted to get a divorce from the defendant in the Keokuk county district court on the same grounds now alleged, except desertion. That case was tried before Judge Talbott, and her petition dismissed on the merits April 3, 1917. Plaintiff's mother testified on the examination by the court that for the last fifteen or sixteen years the defendant has been in the habit of getting drunk. She also testifies that defendant would come down and visit witness, and that he came when plaintiff did a part of the time, and part of the time he did not, but the date when plaintiff and defendant visited together is uncertain. Witness Bickford, who testifies in regard to the alleged desertion, testifies on examination by the court that all she knew about it was what plaintiff told her, except while plaintiff was at the home of witness in Washington.

The judgment is affirmed.

Gaynor, Stevens, and Ladd, JJ., concur.

Annotation—Divorce: effect of fact that habit relied upon as ground of divorce was contracted before the marriage.

There seems to be very little in the books on this subject.

The decision in McNABB v. McNABB, ante, 865, is under a statute allowing a divorce from the husband when after marriage he becomes addicted to habitual drunkenness.

It may be observed that in Wheeler v. Wheeler (1880) 53 Iowa, 511, 36 Am. Rep. 240, 5 N. W. 689, where it was claimed by the defendant that "he was addicted to an excessive use of intoxicating liquors before his marriage, that on one or two occasions he was drunk, and that the plaintiff so knew," it was found, as matter of fact, that he was not an habitual drunkard at the time of his marriage; that in Bill v. Bill (1916) — Iowa, —, 157 N. W. 158, it was held that the defendant was not in the habit of drinking to excess before marriage; and that in Lewis v. Lewis (1888) 75 Iowa, 200, 39 N. W. 271, there was sufficient evidence outside that of the plaintiff to show that the habit did not become habitual until after the marriage, the statute providing that "no divorce shall be granted on the testimony of the plaintiff alone."

It may be noted, for example, that in McMahon v. McMahon (1910) 170 Ala. 338, 54 So. 165, the statutory ground for divorce was "becoming addicted after marriage to habitual drunkenness;" and that in McBee v. McBee (1892) 22 Or. 329, 29 Am. St. Rep. 613, 29 Pac. 887, the statutory ground was "habitual gross drunkenness contracted since marriage and continuing for one year prior to the commencement of the suit."

contracted after marriage, the court said: "To make out a cause of divorce upon the ground of habits of intoxication, such habits must not only have been gross and confirmed, but they must have been contracted since the marriage; if they were contracted before the marriage, although not known to the other party until afterwards, they would not be a cause of divorce." Lyster v. Lyster (1873) 111 Mass. 327.

And where the statutory ground was habitual drunkenness when the party has contracted the habit of drunkenness after the marriage, the court, in dismissing the wife's bill, said inter alia: "The whisky or drinking habit of the defendant existed before the marriage. This is not disputed. That the complainant was cognizant of it before the marriage is not seriously disputed or disputable under the evidence." Hickerson v. Hickerson (1899) — Tenn. —, 52 S. W. 1019.

Under a statute providing that the court may grant a divorce when the defendant "shall have become an habitual drunkard," the defendant must have become an habitual drunkard after the marriage. Porritt v. Porritt (1867) 16 Mich. 140, where the court said: "Unless, perhaps, when his habits have been concealed from the complainant's knowledge until after the marriage, a point upon which we express no opinion, as it is not before us."

In Tilton v. Tilton (1895) 16 Ky. L. Rep. 538, 29 S. W. 290, the wife had sued for divorce on various grounds, including a confirmed habit of drunkenness, and the chancellor had refused any relief to her, but granted a divorce to the husband. Although reversing this decree the court said: "The distress of mind on her part, and the cruelty of the husband, consisted in his persistent purpose to lead a life of dissipation, and this the unfortunate woman was appraised of, and assumed to risk, when taking him as her husband; and upon this state of facts the chancellor would have been justified in dismissing her petition, and certainly denying to her such relief as an absolute divorce." In this case the statutory ground was "confirmed habit of drunkenness on the part of the husband, of not less than one year's duration, accompanied with a wasting of his estate, and without any suitable provision for the maintenance of his wife or children."

For the general subject of drunkenness as effecting divorce, see the note in 34 L.R.A. 449. For morphinism as a ground for divorce, see the note in 39 L.R.A. 264. As to who is an habitual drunkard within the meaning of the divorce laws, see the notes in 6 L.R.A. (N.S.) 914, and 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 655. For reformation as effecting right of divorce on ground of drunkenness or use of drugs, see the note in L.R.A. 1917D, 361. For effect of complainant's knowledge of spouse's antenuptial unchastity as a bar to divorce for subsequent adultery, see the note in 23 L.R.A. (N.S.) 240. B. B. B.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

JOSEPH LEBENS, Appt.,

v.

PETER WOLF, Respt.

(— Minn. —, 165 N. W. 276.)

Evidence — negligence of bailee — burden of proof.

1. In this action to recover damages for injury to a stallion while in the care and custody of defendant as bailee, the burden of proof is upon plaintiff, the bailor, to establish that the injury resulted from defendant's negligence or breach of duty to exercise the due care required under the contract of bailment. This is so whether the bailment be gratuitous or for the mutual benefit of the parties.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. h, 1, f, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — sufficiency.

2. When plaintiff proved that defendant received the animal in a good condition and returned the same with an injury which ordinarily does not happen without negligence of the keeper, a prima facie case was made out, and it was error to then dismiss the action.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. h, 1, f, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — The question of presumption and burden of proof as to care or negligence in respect to subject of bailment is discussed in an extensive note to Stone v. Case, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168; and see later cases, Nutt v. Davidson, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1170; Travelers' Indemnity Co. v. Fawkes, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 331; and Colburn v. Washington State Art Asso. L.R.A. 1915A, 594. APPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Nobles County denying new trial of an action brought to recover damages for injuries to a horse while in defendant's care and custody as bailee. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. J. A. Cashel for appellant.

Mr. E. H. Canfield for respondent.

Holt, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The complaint alleges the loan of a stallion, in good condition to defendant, upon the agreement that he should be used solely for farm work; that the defendant should feed and care for him and take extraordinary precaution to prevent his being injured, disabled, or overworked, and that defendant neglected to care for the animal so that he "became kicked" and permanently injured, in which condition he was returned to plaintiff, the owner, causing a damage in the sum of $878.25. When plaintiff rested, the action was dismissed on defendant's motion. The appeal is from the order denying a new trial.

Since the horse was returned to the bailor, the cause of action is not to be considered as one in conversion imposing the burden upon the bailee of proving that the loss was not due to want of care, under the rule in Davis v. Tribune Printing Co. 70 Minn. 95, 72 N. W. 808, but as one based upon negligence or failure of the bailee to give the subject of the bailment proper care while in his custody. Shropshire v. Sidebottom, 30 Mont. 406, 76 Pac. 941. The burden of proof is therefore upon plaintiff to show defendant's negligence or breach of duty to use due care as the cause of the injury.

"The final burden is on the bailor to prove negligence, not on the bailee to prove due care." Sanford v. Kimball, 106 Me. 355, 138 Am. St. Rep. 345, 76 Atl. 890. It matters not whether the bailment was gratuitous or for the mutual benefit of both parties, for the character of the bailment would only bear upon the care to be exercised in respect to the property bailed. Pregent v. Mills, 51 Wash. 187, 98 Pac. 328. Some decisions involving damages under bailments speak of the burden of proof as shifting to the bailee upon the bailor proving that the property was in good condition when delivered and in a damaged state when returned. But, accurately speaking, the burden of proof never shifts in the trial of a law suit. The burden of evidence may shift. When the testimony is all in, the preponderance thereof must be in favor of that litigant who, under the pleadings and the nature of the cause of action or defense, has the burden of proof; otherwise the decision will go to the other party. McEleney v. Donovan, 119 Minn. 294, 138 N. W. 306; Rustad v. Great Northern R. Co. 122 Minn. 453, 142 N. W. 727; J. D. Marshall Livery Co. v. McKelvey, 55 Mo. App. 240; Willett v. Rich, 142 Mass. 356, 56 Am. Rep. 684, 7 N. E. 776.

But, notwithstanding that the burden of proof in this case was upon plaintiff to prove negligence of defendant as the cause of the stallion's injury, we are of opinion that a prima facie case was made; hence it was error to dismiss the action. True it is that the authorities are not in harmony as to what proof will make a prima facie case in the bailment of animals, some holding that proof of good condition when delivered to the bailee and of injured when returned is not sufficient. Malaney v. Taft, 60 Vt. 571, 6 Am. St. Rep. 135, 15 Atl. 328. Others again declare such proof adequate. Miller v. Miloslawsky, 153 Iowa, 135, 133 N. W. 357; Jackson v. McDonald, 70 N. J. L. 594, 57 Atl. 126, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 611; Hislop v. Ordner, 28 Tex. Civ. App. 540, 67 S. W. 337, 11 Am. Neg. Rep. 507; Rutherford v. Krause, 55 App. Div. 210, 66 N. Y. Supp. 781. But it may be a harsh rule to permit an inference of negligence or want of care from the mere fact that a bailee returns an animal in a diseased or injured condition, because, in spite of due care or even the the best of care, animals are subject to sickness and accidental injury in moving about. They are different in this respect from other bailable property. Therefore this rule, announced by several courts, appears more fair than either of the two mentioned, to wit: The bailor makes a prima facie case when he shows that the animal when left in the keeping of the bailee was in good condition and was returned suffering from an injury that does not ordinarily occur without negligence on the part of its keeper. Hildebrand v. Carroll, 106 Wis. 324, 80 Am. St. Rep. 29, 82 N. W. 145; Powers v. Jughardt, 101 App. Div. 53, 91 N. Y. Supp. 556; Collins v. Bennett, 46 N. Y. 490, 1 Am. Neg. Cas. 696; Nutt v. Davison, 54 Colo. 586, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1170, 131 Pac. 390, and cases cited under headings IX, and X, in the note to Stone v. Case, 43 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1168.

Without discussing or setting out the testimony it is enough, in view of our conclusion that a new trial must be had, to say that plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that defendant returned the stallion with an injury which, on account of its nature and location, could not well have been caused by disease or by accidental hurt while the animal was unattended in his stall, so that the jury, in the absence of any explanation from the one in whose care defendant had placed him when the injury first appeared, might reasonably infer that improper use or care was the cause thereof. This, under the rule last stated, makes a prima facie case which defendant must meet with proof in explanation or avoidance of the inference of improper care, which otherwise the jury might legitimately draw from the facts proven.

There should be a new trial.

Order reversed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT. (In Banc.)

MINNIE T. BOLIN
v.

TYROL INVESTMENT COMPANY.

(— Mo. —, 200 S. W. 1059.)

Covenant — restrictive — apartment house.

An apartment house with six apartments is a dwelling within a covenant that a grantee shall not construct upon the property a dwelling less than two stories in height, or construct more than one dwelling on each 50 feet of frontage.

For other cases, see Covenants and Conditions, II. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(Graves, Ch. J., and Walker and Blair, JJ., dissent.)

Note. — For multiple residence structures as violation of restrictive covenants, see annotation following this case, post, 873, and references therein to annotation on related questions.

CERTIFICATION by the St. Louis Court of Appeals for determination by the Supreme Court, after reversal by it, of an appeal from a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis, dismissing a suit brought to enjoin defendant from erecting an apartment house in violation of a restrictive covenant in a deed. Judgment of the Circuit Court affirmed.

Statement by Brown, C.:

This suit was brought to the June term, 1910, of the circuit court for the city of St. Louis, for the purpose of obtaining an injunction restraining the defendant from erecting an apartment house on lot 15 in block 3810 of Chamberlain park, a subdivision of the city of St. Louis. The lot is on the southwest corner of Etzel and Belt avenues, on each of which is a frontage of about 200 feet. The house which defendant proposed to build is a handsome structure to cost between $25,000 and $30,000. It is to be three stories in height, with a single entrance in the middle of the front elevation, opening into a common hall, from which access is had to each suite or apartment, of which there are three on each side, each occupying the entire floor on that side. There are no porches or other structures on the outside indicating the different apartments. In short, the words "apartment house" used in the petition properly describe it.

One Chamberlain, being the owner of the land in 1887, laid out the subdivision by statutory plat. The Western Realty Company, having acquired it, conveyed block 3810 to John Jackson by deed dated October 5, 1887, in which it was expressly provided that neither the said grantee, nor anyone claiming by, through, or under him, prior to the 31st day of December, 1920:

"1. Shall construct or allow to be constructed in the premises above described any dwelling house less than two stories in height.

"2. Shall construct or allow to be constructed more than one such dwelling on each 50 feet front of said lot.

"3. Shall construct or allow to be constructed thereon any dwelling to cost less than $4,000 in cash, nor locate or erect such dwelling nearer than 30 feet to the line of the street on which such dwelling fronts.

"4. Shall construct or allow to be constructed any stable, shed, or outhouse nearer to any public driveway than 100 feet.

"5. Shall construct or allow to be constructed or erected or to exist any nuisance or any livery stable or manufacturing establishment of any kind on said premises.

"6. Shall construct or allow to be constructed, used, or occupied any grocery store, L.R.A.1918C.

barroom, or business place for the bargain and sale of any kind of merchandise on said premises. To have and to hold the premises hereby conveyed, subject to the exceptions, reservations, conditions, and reversions aforesaid."

Both plaintiff and defendant claim by mesne conveyances through Jackson.

Messrs. Frumberg & Russell, for plaintiff:

An apartment house is a number of dwellings, and the erection of such a building is a violation of a restriction against the erection of more than one dwelling.

Messrs. Ephrim Caplan and Rassieur, Kammerer, & Rassieur, for defendant:

Restrictive covenants, being in derogation of the right to the unrestricted use of property, are to be construed strictly against the parties seeking to enforce them, and they will not be extended by implication to include anything not plainly prohibited.

Zinn v. Sidler, 268 Mo. 680, L.R.A.1917A, 455, 187 S. W. 1172; Kitchen v. Hawley, 150 Mo. App. 497, 131 S. W. 142; Pank v. Eaton, 115 Mo. App. 171, 89 S. W. 586; Hartman v. Wells, 257 Ill. 167, 100 N. E. 500, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 901.

Where the grantor enters into detail, specifying certain matters as prohibited, it is to be presumed, if nothing to the contrary appears, that buildings of a character not thus excluded are intended as a proper use of the property. All doubts are to be resolved in favor of the free and untrammelled use of the property and against restrictions.

Underwood v. Herman, 82 N. J. Eq. 353, 89 Atl. 21; Kitchen v. Hawley, 150 Mo. App. 497, 131 S. W. 142; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556; Hunt v. Held, 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A.1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051; St. Andrew's Lutheran Church's Appeal, 67 Pa. 512.

Restrictions as to construction and restrictions as to user are different and distinct, and a restriction against plural structures will not be construed to prohibit a plural use of a single structure unless such intention is clearly expressed.

Hamnett v. Born, 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505; Arnoff v. Williams, 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661; Pank v. Eaton, 115 Mo. App. 171, 89 S. W. 586; Kenwood Land Co. v. Hancock Invest. Co. 169 Mo. App. 715, 155 S. W. 861; Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444.

Where the restriction has reference only to the construction of a permitted structure, and the language employed describes the building which may be erected in terms which have a general significance, and the restriction makes no reference to the use of the structure, then the terms employed will be given their usual and ordinary meaning.

Pank v. Eaton, 115 Mo. App. 171, 89 S. W. 586; Kitchen v. Hawley, 150 Mo. App. 497, 131 S. W. 142; Hamnett v. Born, supra; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556.

A narrow and restricted meaning will not be given unless such intention is clearly expressed in the deed.

McMurtry v. Phillips Invest. Co. 103 Ky. 308, 40 L.R.A. 489, 45 S. W. 96; Arnoff v. Williams, 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661; Fortesque v. Carroll, 76 N. J. Eq. 583, 75 Atl. 923, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 79.

The term "dwelling house" is a general term merely descriptive of a structure suitable for human habitation, irrespective of how it may be occupied, and one dwelling house may be so constructed as to contain separate apartments, each of which may constitute a dwelling, yet the whole be in fact but one structure.

Berry, Real Prop. § 95; Johnson v. Jones, 244 Pa. 389, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 90 Atl. 649; Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444.

An apartment house is a "dwelling house," and does not violate a restriction prohibiting the erection of more than one dwelling house on a single lot.

Hamnett v. Born, 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505; Arnoff v. Williams, 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661; Sonn v. Heilberg, 38 App. Div. 515, 56 N. Y. Supp. 341; Bates v. Logeling, 137 App. Div. 578, 122 N. Y. Supp. 251; Holt v. Fleischman, 75 App. Div. 593, 78 N. Y. Supp. 647; Stone v. Pillsbury, 167 Mass. 332, 45 N. E. 768; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556.

Brown, C., filed the following opinion:

The sole question presented by the parties in this court is whether the erection of the building described would be a violation of any of the restrictive covenants of the deed. Covenants of this character expressed in deeds of conveyance of lands are in the L.R.A.1918C.

nature of easements reserved by the grantor in the lands conveyed, appurtenant to his other lands. Compton-Hill Improv Co. v. Tower, 158 Mo. 282, 59 S. W. 239; King v. Union Trust Co. 226 Mo. 351, 126 S. W. 415. In these cases we called it "an easement running with the land." It is, as such, an encumbrance consistent with the passing of the fee by the conveyance in which it is reserved. The curious will find this subject interestingly discussed, with reference to many authorities with which it is unnecessary to encumber this record, in §§ 4 and 5 of Berry's "Restrictions on the Use of Real Property." It is useless to waste words in demonstrating that such easements are usually reserved by the grantor in the hope that they will prove valuable to him in the disposition of his land. Being in derogation of the fee conveyed by the deed, such covenants will not be extended by implication to include anything not clearly expressed in them. Zimm v. Sidler, 268 Mo. 680, L.R.A.1917A, 455, 187 S. W. 1172; Kitchen v. Hawley, 150 Mo. App. 497, 131 S. W. 142; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556; Hartman v. Wells, 257 Ill. 167, 172, 100 N. E. 500, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 901; Hamnett v. Born, 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505; Johnson v. Jones, 244 Pa. 386, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 90 Atl. 649. The words "clearly expressed," as used by this and other courts, have no significance, unless they mean that if a reasonable and substantial doubt is raised by the words employed in the covenant, it must be resolved against the grantor. Stone v. Pillsbury, 167 Mass. 332, 45 N. E. 768, and cases cited; Johnson v. Jones, supra; Grooms v. Morrison, 249 Mo. 544, 155 S. W. 480; Linville v. Greer, 165 Mo. 380, 65 S. W. 579. It is only by such construction that such titles can be made certain, so that the use of lands conveyed in fee shall not depend upon the diverse opinions of judges as to the minds of the parties to the grant, but restrictions thereon shall appear plainly written in the grant.

This subdivision was platted in May, 1887. On October 5, 1887, the Western Realty Company had acquired it, and on that date conveyed block 3810 to John Jackson, with the restrictions we have quoted. This was an important transaction, involving, according to the evidence, between 2,000 and 3,000 feet of the frontage of the subdivision on Bartmer and Etzel avenues. These restrictions were evolved from the desire of the Realty Company to sell and of Jackson to buy. The company was, so to speak, walking on the top rail of the fence which divided profit from loss,—the hoped-for advantage to its other lands from the restrictions it might impose, and the loss of the bargain it was making,--with only its pen for a balance, and it behooved it to use it carefully to save itself from falling on the wrong side. Mr. Jackson's interest did not lie with its, for restrictions would do him no good. He could create them by his own deeds, should he so desire. The result was that the Realty Company, if it ever had the idea of making block 3810 an exclusive residence district, as charged in the petition and argued at bar, abandoned it, and placed in the deed nothing which could, by any logical stretch of the imagination, be construed into such a restriction. On the contrary, it proceeded, in express terms, to enumerate other structures which it desired to exclude. These were livery stables, manufacturing establishments, grocery stores, barrooms, and business places for the bargain and sale of merchandise. By the operation of the good old maxim, "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius," it excluded all other structures than those mentioned from the category of its restrictive easements. Purchasers under that deed might erect office buildings, hospitals, hotels, boarding houses, churches, homes for the aged and for abandoned infants, and many other structures intended to be used for purposes of business or charity not included in its list. Apartment houses are not referred to unless they come within the description "dwelling house." We gather from the instrument that all these matters were in the minds of the parties when the Jackson deed was made, and that the extent to which the new enterprise was to be encumbered with these restrictions was discussed and determined. The argument of the appellant in this case seems to be founded, to a great extent, upon the ideal which it is assumed the founder of Chamberlain park and the Western Realty Company had in mind when he conceived the enterprise, and not upon the shattered fragments which survived this sale. With the first we have nothing to do. We are only concerned with the last.

The first restrictive clause in the deed refers to the construction of any "dwelling house" on the premises described less than two stories in height. With this clause we have nothing to do except to use the word "house" therein contained in explanation of the meaning of the adjective "such" in the second clause, which shows that it refers to the word "house" as already used, so that the clause reads in effect, "shall construct or allow to be constructed more than one such dwelling house on each 50 feet front of said lot." This is the clause upon which the appellant depends to maintain her suit. If it is not a dwelling house, there is no restriction; if it is a dwelling house, L.R.A.1918C.

it is expressly permitted; only on the theory that it is six dwelling houses can she maintain her suit.

The building, according to the testimony, is handsome and expensive, each apartment of the six which it contains costing more than the $4,000 specified as the minimum cost of an entire house. That it conforms to the building line established is admitted. The only contention upon which appellant rests her case is that each apartment in this house is a "house" within the meaning of the second clause of the restrictions. This implies the absurdity that one house, if it be an apartment house, is six houses, and does mortal violence to the dictionary definition of the word, in which all the lexicographers of our language seem to agree, so that we will quote from the International, which is, we believe, authority. So far as it defines "house" as a structure it is as follows: "A structure intended or used for human habitation; esp., a human habitation which is fixed in place and is intended for the private occupation of a family or families."

This definition is supported by many judicial authorities, some of which refer to the very question before us. Among the latter are the following: Reformed Protestant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444; Hamnett v. Born, 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505; Bates v. Logeling, 137 App. Div. 578, 122 N. Y. Supp. 251; Johnson v. Jones, supra; Arnoff v. Williams, 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661; Hutchinson v. Ulrich, 145 Ill. 336, 21 L.R.A. 391, 34 N. E. 556; Stone v. Pillsbury, 167 Mass. 332, 45 N. E. 768.

The appellant cites us to Sanders v. Dixon, 114 Mo. App. 229, 89 S. W. 577, and Thompson v. Langan, 172 Mo. App. 64, 154 S. W. 808, as sustaining her contention, as well as to this case, which is reported in 178 Mo. App. at page 1, 160 S. W. 588, 164 S. W. 259, and certified to this court on the ground of conflict with the decisions of this court in Grooms v. Morrison, 249 Mo. 544, 155 S. W. 430, and Linville v. Greer, 165 Mo. 380, 65 S. W. 579. In the Sanders Case the meaning of the word "house" was not involved, nor used in the covenants. So far as either of those cases conflicts with the conclusion at which we have arrived, we do not follow them. Nor do we incline to the doctrine of the Michigan supreme court as expressed in the cases cited by appellant, beginning with and following Harris v. Roraback, 137 Mich. 292, 109 Am. St. Rep. 681, 100 N. W. 391. We consider them, in their application to the deed before us, as clearly against the great weight of authority in other states, as expressed in cases we have already cited, in which precisely the same question now before us was in issue and decided. We will not refrain, however, from referring to the exact question decided in some of these cases. In Schadt v. Brill, 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878, the restriction prohibited the construction of a "store, factory, or building, other than a dwelling house," upon the premises, and that the premises should be used for residence purposes only. The court held that a double house or flat was not a dwelling house within the meaning of the restriction. In that respect it is an authority directly in respondent's favor. If this building is not six dwelling houses it does not come within the restriction. In Bagnall v. Young, 151 Mich. 69, 114 N. W. 674, the condition in the deed was "that nothing but a two-story dwelling house, costing not less than twenty-five hundred dollars, . . . shall be erected on said lots." The court held this restriction to be violated for reasons stated in Harris v. Roraback, supra, by the erection of a double two-story house. The covenant was held to mean that "no house except one planned and designed for a single dwelling should be erected." In all these cases the covenant or condition prohibited the construction on the land of any building other than a dwelling house, and the court held that a double house or flat did not come within that description. In the case before us all other structures except the few especially prohibited are clearly permissible.

In this comment we do not intend to express our approval of the doctrine announced by the Michigan court in these cases, but only to direct attention to the inapplicability of its reasoning to this case.

The judgment of the Circuit Court for the City of St. Louis is affirmed.

Annotation—Multiple residence structures as violation of restrictive covenants.

This note is supplemental to the note to Schadt v. Brill, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, where the earlier cases are collected, and where there will be found a statement of the general principles.

This note does not include community residence as violation of restrictive covenant as that question is treated in the note to Easterbrook v. Hebrew Ladies' Orphan Asylum, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 615; And see later case, Hunter Tract Improv. Co. v. Catholic Bishop Corp. L.R.A.1918A, 297. Nor does it include the question of hotel or lodging house as violation of restrictive covenants, that question being treated in the note to Sayles v. Hall, 41 L.R.A.(N.S.) 625.

The right to enforce restrictive covenants as affected by change in neighborhood is considered in the note to Brown v. Huber, 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 706.

Construction of particular forms of covenants—residence purposes only.

A clause in a conveyance restricting the use of the property conveyed "for residence purposes only" does not prohibit the erection of a double or two-family house on the premises. Hunt v. L.R.A.1918C.

Held (1914) 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A. 1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051.

So, an agreement that premises shall be used "for residence purposes only," and that no more than one residence building shall be located upon a lot, does not prohibit the erection of a four-suite apartment house. Arnoff v. Williams (1916) 94 Ohio St. 145, 113 N. E. 661.

In Maine v. Mulliken (1913) 176 Mich. 443, 142 N. W. 782, the court seemed to consider that a covenant that a lot "shall be used for residence purposes only" was not transgressed by a four-family flat.

For construction of the covenant in Misch v. Lehman (1913) 178 Mich. 225, 144 N. W. 556, see infra.

—dwelling house or houses.

Supplementing note in 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) p. 729.

A covenant limiting the use of a city lot to a dwelling house with the ordinary yard appurtenances of dwelling houses, and excepting stables of brick or stone for private dwellings, does not exclude an apartment house, apartment houses not being known when the covenant was drawn. Reformed Protest- ant Dutch Church v. Madison Ave. Bldg. Co. (1915) 214 N. Y. 268, L.R.A.1915F, 651, 108 N. E. 444.

A covenant in deeds of a subdivision of city property, inserted so that buildings or structures upon the property might harmonize and tend to beautify the entire neighborhood and advance values, which provides that nothing but a church or dwelling house and the necessary outbuildings shall ever be erected upon any part of the land, is not violated by a four-story apartment house, each apartment being suitable only for separate use as a housekeeping apartment. Johnson v. Jones (1914) 244 Pa. 386, 52 L.R.A.(N.S.) 325, 90 Atl. 649.

Where there had been a considerable number of two-family houses erected, and the restriction was not to erect any building other than a dwelling house and its appropriate buildings, the court declined to enjoin the erection of what was termed "a modern high-class apartment house," the apartment house being three stories high, and most of the buildings on the restricted tract being three stories high. Underwood v. Herman & Co. (1913) 82 N. J. Eq. 353, 89 Atl. 21. The court referred to the doctrine that restrictions should be strictly construed against the restrictor, and said: "The grantors in their covenant made no attempt by language to define the meaning of a 'dwelling house and its appropriate buildings,' but allowed each grantee, in the practical adaptation of the land to his personal requirements, to construe the language of the covenant to meet the personal exigency. In this manner language of an uncertain and indefinite character received a practical interpretation upon the land by the grantees, presumably with the acquiescence of the grantors and prior grantees."

— one dwelling or a single dwelling.

A restriction that no more than one dwelling house shall be erected or maintained on each 40 feet of land is not transgressed by a duplex house designed for the occupancy of two families under one roof, so arranged as to furnish each family with a complete and independent apartment having independent and separate entrances after the common front entrance has been passed. Hamnett v. Born (1915) 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505.

In Misch v. Lehman (Mich.) supra, the court enjoined the defendant from "proceeding with the construction, erection, or maintenance, or causing to be constructed, erected, or maintained, any flat, double house, apartment, or any other building except a single dwelling house, intended or suitable for the separate occupancy for one family."

The restriction in that case was the same as in Schadt v. Brill (1913) 173 Mich. 647, 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 726, 139 N. W. 878, prefixed to the earlier note, and was as follows: "That no store, factory, or building other than a dwelling house with the usual appurtenances thereto, shall be erected upon the above-described premises, and that said premises shall be used for residence purposes only, and that no dwelling shall be erected thereon at a cost of less than $5,000, exclusive of the value of outbuildings and appurtenances thereto, and that such dwelling house shall not be less than two and one-half stories high, and shall have a brick or stone cellar under the whole thereof, and shall not be erected within 20 feet of the front or street line of said premises, and shall front or face the boulevard."

— detached dwelling house.

A covenant that the property be "used only as a site for a detached brick or stone dwelling house" is transgressed by an apartment house. Pearson v. Adams (1914) 50 Can. S. C. 204, where an injunction was granted. The court reversed (1913) 28 Ont. L. Rep. 154, which, in its turn, had reversed (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, cited in the earlier note.

The erection of flats and apartment buildings was enjoined where flats or apartments were forbidden by the restriction. Miller v. Klein (1913) 177 Mo. App. 557, 160 S. W. 562.

— miscellaneous.

See also note in 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) p. 735.

A business block, although it may be used to some extent for residence purposes, is not included within a restrictive covenant that "no dwelling shall be erected on said above premises herein conveyed containing less than six rooms, said dwelling to be located not less than 24 feet from the street line, not including porches," the covenant providing further that no intoxicating liquors should be sold or manufactured or trafficked in on said premises. The court considered that the provision relating to the location of a dwelling did not apply to the location of such a business block. Kiley v. Hall (1917) — Ohio St. —, L.R.A.1918B, 961, 117 N. E. 359.

Application of covenants to particular kinds of buildings — double houses.

A double or two-family house is not forbidden by a clause in a conveyance restricting the use of the property conveyed "for residence purposes only." Hunt v. Held (1914) 90 Ohio St. 280, L.R.A.1915D, 543, 107 N. E. 765, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 1051.

A duplex house designed for the occupancy of two families under one roof, so arranged as to furnish each family with a complete and independent apartment, having independent and separate entrances after the common front entrance has been passed, does not transgress a restriction that no more than one dwelling house shall be erected or maintained on each 40 feet of land. Hannett v. Born (1915) 247 Pa. 418, 93 Atl. 505.

See also Misch v. Lehman (1913) 178 Mich. 225, 144 N. W. 556, supra.

— flat house.

Supplementing note in 45 L.R.A. (N.S.) p. 736.

In Maine v. Mulliken (1913) 176 Mich. 443, 142 N. W. 782, the court seemed to consider that a four-family flat did not transgress a covenant that a lot "shall be used for residence purposes only."

The erection of flats and apartment houses was enjoined where flats or apartments were forbidden by the restriction. Miller v. Klein (Mo.) supra.

See also Misch v. Lehman (Mich.) supra.

Supplementing note in 45 L.R.A. (N. S.) p. 737. See BOLIN v. TYROL INVEST. Co. ante, 869.

A four-story apartment house, each apartment being suitable only for separate use as a housekeeping apartment, is not a violation of a covenant in deeds of a subdivision of city property, inserted so that buildings or structures upon the property might harmonize and tend to beautify the entire neighborhood and advance values, which provides that nothing but a church or dwelling house and the necessary outbuildings shall ever be erected upon any part of the land. *Johnson v. But it has been held that an apartment house transgresses a covenant that the property be "used only as a site for a detached brick or stone dwelling house." Pearson v. Adams (1914) 50 Can. S. C. 204, where an injunction was granted. The court reversed (1913) 28 Ont. L. Rep. 154, which in its turn had reversed (1912) 27 Ont. L. Rep. 87, cited in the earlier note.

In Miller v. Klein (1913) 177 Mo. App. 557, 160 S. W. 562, the erection of flats and apartment buildings was enjoined where flats or apartments were forbidden by the restriction.

Charity — exemption of revenues from endowment fund — office building.

1. The exemption from liability for personal injuries extended to charitable organi-

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County sustaining in part a demurrer to the declaration in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendants' negligence. Reversed in part.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. A. F. Whitman and Pitts & McConico, for plaintiff in certiorari:

There is no exemption from liability of the defendants by reason of the fact that Vanderbilt University is an educational corporation operated without capital stock and without personal profit to the institution or its founders,—in short, because it is a charity.

Neill, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought in the circuit court of Davidson county against Vanderbilt University and its executive committee to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon the plaintiff's intestate by the falling of an elevator in an office building owned and operated by the university.

The first count of the declaration contains all of the matters necessary to be considered in connection with the demurrer on which the questions for decision arise.

This count contains the following averments:

"(1) That defendant Vanderbilt University is a corporation created and organized under the laws of Tennessee and having its situs at Nashville, in said state, and is engaged, and has been for many years, among other things, in the renting and operation of a large building for office purposes, owned by said defendant and situated at Nos. 311 and 313 Fourth avenue north, formerly Cherry street, in the heart of the business district of said city of Nashville, and remote from and wholly separate and distinct from its university buildings and grounds, which are situated in the suburbs of said city.

"(2) That said building consists of five stories, besides a basement, and contains numerous offices which are and have been for many years rented out annually to business and professional persons, firms, and corporations wholly disconnected with said Vanderbilt University or its educational work, in like manner in all respects as other office quarters are owned and rented out to tenants by other property owners of said city, and from whom are collected monthly rentals by said defendant in like manner in all respects as such rentals are collected by other landlords from their tenants in said city.

"(3) That said defendant owns, maintains, and operates in said building, and has done so for many years, an elevator for the use of its tenants therein, in like manner in all respects as elevators are owned, maintained, and operated by other owners in other office buildings in said city.

"(4) That only a small part of said building is and has been at any time used by said defendant for its law department, and for its law library for the use of its law students, and the larger portion of said building is and has been for many years rented out, as aforesaid, to tenants as business offices, and the principal use to which the said building is and has always been devoted is that of rented offices, and from which said defendant derives a large annual income, to wit, the sum of between $5,000 and $10,000, and the rentals charged and collected are the full, usual, and customary rates charged for similar offices in said city.

"(5) That said defendant owns and operates and has for many years owned and operated other buildings in the business portions of said city of Nashville, which it rents out and has rented out for many years for business, hotel, banking, and residence purposes, to persons, firms, and corporations in no way connected with its university or institution of learning, and from which it receives and has been for many years receiving an annual income of many thousands of dollars; in fact, said defendant is and has been for many years one of the largest business property owners of said city of Nashville.

"(6) That the foregoing facts and conditions existed at and before the time of the injuries hereinafter complained of.

"(7) That, at and before the time of the injuries complained of, defendants J. H. Kirkland, W. R. Cole, G. M. Neeley, and John B. Ransom were members of the executive committee of said defendant Vanderbilt University, and as such had charge and control of the building aforesaid on Fourth avenue north, and they and their associates and their appointees, agents, servants, and employees were charged with the duty of supervision, management, and operation of said building and the elevators therein.

"(8) That plaintiff's said husband, Tip Gamble, at and before the time of the injuries herein complained of, was a tenant of defendants, occupying an office on the fourth floor of said building of defendants at 311 and 313 Fourth avenue north, to wit, in the year 1908.

"(9) That on or about the 25th day of November, 1908, during business hours, the plaintiff's said husband, a lawyer, being at that time a tenant of said building as aforesaid, and lawfully therein, entered the said elevator at the said fourth floor for the purpose of descending to the street or first floor, the said elevator being at the time in charge of and operated by a temporary servant of defendants, and not the regular operator or conductor, when, as the said elevator descended, the said temporary operator or conductor, by reason of his negligence and incompetence, and the defective, worn, and unsafe condition of the said elevator, lost control thereof and it fell rapidly to the bottom, where the violent and sudden stop and concussion so severely jarred and injured plaintiff's said husband that, by reason of such violent and sudden concussion and injury, which were wholly without any fault or negligence on his part, he suffered great bodily and mental pain and anguish, and was forced to incur, pay out, and expend a large sum of money, to wit, the sum of $1,000, for medical and other treatment and service in and about efforts for his cure for a long space of time, to wit, until the 2d day of January, 1909, when, as the result of said injury, he died.

"(10) And so the plaintiff avers that the death of her said husband, Tip Gamble, was caused by the negligence of defendants and their agents, servants, and employees in suffering and permitting the said elevator and its braking and controlling apparatus and machinery to be, become, and remain defective, worn, out of repair, unsafe, and insufficient to control the movements of said elevator and so as to render said elevator unsafe and dangerous to tenants and other persons lawfully in said building, and which defects were known to defendants, and not known to plaintiff's said husband; and also by the negligence of defendants in employing and placing in charge of said elevator an unskilled, inexperienced, and incompetent servant as conductor or operator thereof, and whose inexperience and incompetency resulted in his loss of control or inability to control the movements of said elevator; and also by the negligence of the said temporary operator or conductor in failing to operate the same with reasonable care, to plaintiff's damage $25,000; and therefore she sues and demands a jury to try the cause."

There are several grounds of demurrer, but we need consider only the third, which presents the point that the defendant corporation is a charitable institution, and, as such, holds its funds in trust for eleemosynary purposes, and therefore it cannot be held liable in damages for the injuries complained of. This ground of demurrer was sustained in the trial court, and also in the court of civil appeals, and the case is now L.R.A.1918C.

here on the writ of certiorari to the latter court to review its decision.

We shall defer, for the present, the consideration of the case of the executive committee.

It is conceded by the plaintiff that the defendant is a charitable institution, and the counsel for the latter have so treated the case. Therefore we need not consider whether the declaration charges the fact with sufficient clearness.

The question for determination is whether the defendant charitable corporation is exempt from liability in an action of damages for the tort averred in the declaration. We had occasion to consider the general subject in Abston v. Waldon Academy, 118 Tenn. 24, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1179, 102 S. W. 351. In that case it was held that the defendant, a charitable corporation, was not liable for an injury to one of its students caused by the negligence of its servants. We adopted what is known in this class of cases as the trust theory. The general reason given was that to permit the payment of such damages would result in a diversion of the trust fund from the purposes to which it was devoted by the donor. Another general idea was that the tolerance of such liabilities would, in many cases, eventuate in the destruction of the charity, with a consequent discouragement of donors, to the detriment of the public welfare. The case, if the court had conceded the doctrine, might well have been decided on the narrower ground to which many of the modern cases are confined, and on which some of the authorities even at that time stood, to the effect that a beneficiary of the charity, in consideration of the privileges enjoyed, must be presumed to have waived any right to damages of the kind referred to. The court, however, with all the authorities before it then in existence, decided to adopt the broader view as being most in accord with sound public policy. We are still of that view, although we do not undervalue the very able opinions (Powers v. Massachusetts Homœopathic Hospital, 65 L.R.A. 372, 47 C. C. A. 122, 109 Fed. 294; Bruce v. Central M. E. Church, 147 Mich. 230, 10 L.R.A.(N.S.) 74, 110 N. W. 951, 11 Ann. Cas. 150; Hordern v. Salvation Army, 199 N. Y. 233, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 62, 139 Am. St. Rep. 889, 92 N. E. 626; Basabo v. Salvation Army, 35 R. I. 22, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1144, 85 Atl. 120, and others in accord) that champion the more restricted theory. There are numerous cases which support the view we have adopted. Among these we may cite the following, in which the rights of third parties were involved: Fire Ins. Patrol v. Boyd, 120 Pa. 624, 1 L.R.A. 417, 6 Am. St. Rep. 745, 15 Atl. 553; Fordyce v.

Also the following, where the parties suing were beneficiaries, but the exemption was placed on the broad ground substantially as we have stated: Perry v. House of Refuge, 63 Md. 20, 52 Am. Rep. 495; Hearn v. Waterbury Hospital, 66 Conn. 98, 31 L.R.A. 224, 33 Atl. 595; Duncan v. Nebraska Sanitarium & Benev. Asso. 92 Neb. 162, 41 L.R.A. (N.S.) 973, 137 N. W. 1120, Ann. E. 649. Of the foregoing cases, Hearn v. Waterbury Hospital limits the exemption to cases where there has been no negligence on the part of the corporation in the selection or retention of servants. There are quite a number of other cases that support the general exemption with the same limitation. Among these are Lindler v. Columbia Hospital, 98 S. C. 25, 27, 81 S. E. 512; McDonald v. Massachusetts General Hospital, 120 Mass. 432, 21 Am. Rep. 529; Thornton v. Franklin Square House, 200 Mass. 465, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 486, 86 N. E. 909; and Farigan v. Pevear, 193 Mass. 147, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 481, 118 Am. St. Rep. 484, 78 N. E. 855, 8 Ann. Cas. 1109. In the view we take of this case, however, it is not necessary that we should go over the authorities mentioned, or the many other authorities on the general subject, all of which we have examined. A sufficiently clear view of the positions of the various courts, with citation of authorities, may be seen, collected in a summary manner, in 5 R. C. L. 374 to 379, §§ 121 to 124; 11 C. J. pages 374 to 378, §§ 106 to 108.

However, we shall observe here that the doctrine designated as the trust fund doctrine, as applied to charities, in relation to the subject we now have in hand, seems to have had its origin in Heriot's Hospital v. Ross, 12 Clark & F. 507, 8 Eng. Reprint, 1508. There an effort was made to hold the corporation liable for the wrong committed by the trustees in refusing to admit to the enjoyment of the charity one who fell within the class intended to be served by it. To sanction such a demand on the trust estate it was said would be naught less than consent on the part of the court to the diversion of a trust fund from the purposes to which it was devoted by the donor, and therefore the claim could not be entertained. The principle would seem to be broad enough to cover all trusts, but it has not been so ruled. In Bennett v. Wyndham, 4 De G. F. & J. 258, 262, 45 Eng. Reprint, 1183, it appeared that a trustee in the due execution of his trust directed the bailiff employed on the settled estate to have certain trees felled. The plaintiff ordered the woodcutters usually employed on the estate to fell the trees. In doing so they permitted a bough to fall into a lane and on a passer-by, breaking his leg. The injured man, Leany, brought suit to recover damages against the trustees, and recovered judgment for a sum equivalent to $6,000 of our money. The trustees paid the damages, and applied in chancery for an allowance out of the estate. The application was granted, the court, speaking through the Lord Justice Knight Bruce, said: "The trustee in this case appears to have meant well, to have acted with due diligence, and to have employed a proper agent to do an act the directing which to be done was within the due discharge of his duty. The agent makes a mistake, the consequences of which subject the trustee to legal liability to a third party. I am of opinion that this liability ought, as between the trustee and the estate, to be borne by the estate."

In case of charitable trusts the principle of immunity was at first applied as a general one, then subsequently limited in some jurisdictions as we have stated. The underlying, though perhaps unexpressed, thought suggesting these restrictions was that public policy would be best served thereby, it being judged by the court so holding more just, more in accord with sound policy, that the charity whose servants had caused the injury should bear the burden rather than third persons who had received no direct benefit from the institution. We say this was, as we think, the underlying reason or principle; the immediate reason, however, assigned in these cases, was that direct beneficiaries of the charity, as for example, patients in charitable hospitals, students in schools and universities based on a charitable foundation, and the like, must be presumed to have agreed to the immunity or exemption, or to have waived liability for injuries inflicted by servants selected with ordinary care. Whether the broad view adopted in our state, and in the states with which we stand, or the more restricted view which obtains in some other jurisdictions, be based on the sounder conception of public policy, is a matter of opinion. Reasons apparently strong have been suggested on each side of the controversy. It seems to us that institutions which so well and so extensively perform public service should in generous measure enjoy the immunity which pertains to those which are strictly public or governmental in their nature; not that the latter principle in terms applies to charities, but that by analogy it should in large measure apply; since charitable institutions, in the care of the sick, the succor of the indigent, the education of the ignorant, and in other fields of activity, perform work which would otherwise devolve on the government, and deplete its revenues. We can only add that, with profound respect for the learned courts that have advanced the theory of implied agreement or waiver as the true ground of exemption, we are unable to regard that theory as furnishing a satisfactory basis. There are cases from time to time occurring, and not altogether infrequent, to which it is, as it seems to us, impossible to apply it,—patients conveyed to hospitals in a demented condition, persons temporarily unconscious from injuries and who require immediate surgical and other attention, those who are so debilitated by disease as to have no power of understanding the terms of a contract, children too young to understand the meaning of a contract, or to make or be bound by one in any form, or even to understand the nature of the work to be done for them. How can such persons be held to waive a right of action which the law gives them? How can they be held to have agreed to an exemption? Manifestly the only sound theory is that of an exemption based on public policy. How this shall be applied to particular cases or classes of cases is a matter in the wise discretion of the courts of each jurisdiction, according to their conception of sound policy. We can see no objection to the application of public policy as a ratio decidendi. Every really new question that comes before the courts is, in the last analysis, determined on the theory, when not determined by differentiation of the principle of a prior case or line of cases, or by the aid of analogies furnished by such prior cases. In balancing conflicting solutions, that one is perceived to tip the scale which the court believes will best promote the public welfare in its probable operation as a general rule or principle. But public policy is not a thing inflexible. No court is wise enough to forecast its influence in all possible contingencies. Distinctions must be made from time to time as sound reason and a true sense of justice may dictate.

As stated, while we are disposed to adhere to the general doctrine already announced in the Abston Case, yet we are of the opinion that a distinction should be taken on the facts of the present case, arising out of the operation by the defendant corporation of the large office building described in the declaration. This is averred to be "remote from and wholly separate and distinct from the university buildings and grounds, which are situated in the suburbs of the city;" that this building consists of five stories, besides the basement, and contains numerous offices which are and which have been for many years rented out annually to business and professional persons, firms, and corporations, wholly disconnected from the university or its educational work, in like manner in all respects as other office quarters are owned and rented out to tenants by other property owners of the city, and from whom are collected monthly rentals by the defendant in like manner in all respects as such rentals are collected by other landlords from their tenants in the city; that defendant owns, maintains, and operates in this office building, and has done so far many years, an elevator for the use of its tenants therein, in like manner in all respects as elevators are owned, maintained, and operated by other owners in other office buildings in the city; that only a small part of the building is and has been at any time used by defendant for its law department and for its law library for the use of its law students, and the larger portion of the building is and has been for many years rented out, as stated, to tenants as business offices, and the principal use to which the building is and has always been devoted is that of rented offices, and from which defendant derives a large annual income, the sum of between $5,000 and $10,000, and the rentals charged and collected are the full, usual, and customary rates charged for similar offices in the city.

Although this building was lawfully operated by the university as an investment for the purpose of making profits to be used in its educational work, as held in Vanderbilt University v. Cheney, 116 Tenn. 259, 94 S. W. 90, yet it was in our judgment an enterprise sufficiently distinct and remote from the central activities of the charitable organization to make it inadvisable, from the viewpoint of public policy, to extend the exemption from liability thereto. Nor indeed can we believe that the welfare of the charity would be advanced or promoted by such extension, since there can be no doubt that, if it be determined that such acts of negligence as are averred in the declaration concerning the management and operation of the elevator in an office building are without redress in law, there would be few patrons of so dangerous an establishment. In our opinion as to such a remote enterprise the corporation should be held liable as any other corporation; but such damages as may be adjudged against it for breaches of duty in respect of such management should be charged as expenses of the operation of the particular property, and only the residue of the income should be available for the uses of the charity. This was in effect the holding in Winnemore v. Philadelphia, 18 Pa. Super. Ct. 625. In that case, as here, a separate building distinct from Girard College was operated for the purpose of making income to be used in the support of the charity. In that case, as in the one before us, the party suing was injured by the negligent operation of the elevator in the adjunct building named. In disposing of the matter the court said: "Were the trustees of the Girard estate permitted to manage the real estate, as now improved, without liability on the part of the fund for the negligent acts of the servants necessary to the usefulness of the property, it would impose an unwarranted risk upon the public and upon the tenants. Such a condition would certainly result in injury to the trust itself, since tenants and frequenters would scarcely be attracted to a building with such extraordinary protection against liability for negligent employees thrown around its ownership."

To the same general effect, see Holder v. Massachusetts Horticultural Soc. 211 Mass. 370, 97 N. E. 630.

We do not think the operation or validity of the exception we have stated is in any wise impaired by the fact that a small part of the building in question is used for the accommodation of the defendant's law department. That is but an incidental use. The main purpose of the building and its chief use is found in its service as an office building let for hire to the general public.

Furthermore, we do not mean to hold that any judgment that may be recovered can be levied upon or collected out of the university grounds or buildings, or any property therein or thereon located capable of use for the conduct of the charity. The declaration shows that there is ample property aside from the university grounds and buildings out of which may be realized any judgment likely to be recovered. It should be noted that in this class of cases the court will not permit judgment to be rendered when it is apparent there is no property out of which it can be collected. Abston v. Waldon Academy, 118 Tenn. 24, 11 L.R.A. L.R.A.1918C.

(N.S.) 1179, 102 S. W. 351. Even after judgment the court will restrain any effort to subject the property of the charity not liable to execution because of its exempt character. Fordyce v. Woman's Christian Nat. Library Asso. 79 Ark. 550, 7 L.R.A. (N.S.) 485, 96 S. W. 155. It is to be observed also that in a rather recent case where the court seemed to support the liability of the corporation as such without regard to any claim of exemption, this caution was added: "Nor are we to be understood as holding that the trust funds of the defendant may be applied to the payment of this verdict. The question is not involved. Defendant is not supported exclusively from such funds. On the contrary, its maintenance would seem from the evidence to come principally from patients who pay for services rendered them." McInerny v. St. Luke's Hospital Asso. 122 Minn. 10, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 548, 141 N. W. 837.

In the case before us the facts stated with regard to the defective elevator and its negligent management resulting in the injury of plaintiff's intestate exhibit a clear cause of action. We are of the opinion, therefore, that the court of civil appeals committed error in sustaining the demurrer filed by Vanderbilt University.

Now as to the case against the members of the executive committee:

Their demurrer is, in effect, that the declaration states no cause of action against them. These defendants were not the trustees of the charity in whom the title was vested; therefore the underservants through whom they discharged their duties were not their servants, but the servants of the corporation. Under the averments of the declaration the members of the committee were only intermediate agents of the corporation, charged with the supervision, control, and operation of the building, including, of course, the passenger elevator. Under a fair construction of the language of the declaration we think it must be assumed that the details of operation, as, for example, the running of the elevator, were properly devolved upon subordinate servants selected by them, under the oversight and control of the executive committee, and also that they held under their control and supervision the fitness and efficiency of the elevator for the use for which it was designed. The substance of the averment is that, knowing the elevator was in a defective and unsafe condition, they, having power to forbid its use, permitted it to be used by the elevator boy on the occasion in question, and that by reason of the defect the elevator fell and caused the injury which resulted in the death of plaintiff's intestate. We attach no importance to the averment concerning the incompetency of the elevator boy, because it is not further averred that the committee had any knowledge or notice of such fact, or that they failed to exercise due care in his selection. Even after the exercise of due care, that is, ordinary care, the defendants in question might have failed to discover the want of competency on the part of the elevator boy. So, the case must turn on the defective condition of the elevator and the use of it in that condition with the knowledge and assent of the committee in charge, and in effect under their continuing order, with the resulting injury.

Does this make a case of liability to a third party, or were the members of the committee on these facts liable only to their principal, the corporation? We think it makes a case of liability to the third party. It was not merely an act of nonfeasance, for which there was responsibility of the intermediate servant to the master only, as, for example, the failure to have the elevator repaired; but a case of actual misconduct, suffering the elevator under their control to be operated that day when they knew it was unsafe and unfit for operation, thereby knowingly subjecting third parties to a great hazard. It was a case not of nonfeasance, but of misfeasance. Having this dangerous agency under their control, they owed to third parties the duty of operating it in such a manner as not to injure them. According to the averment, they knowingly set in motion a dangerous agency which they knew, owing to its defects, would probably injure any passenger riding on it. Under such circumstances they became active participants in the wrong inflicted, and cannot escape liability on the ground of their representative character. They could not be held responsible for any improper management of the machine by the elevator boy, or for negligence on his part (to this the corporation itself would have to respond), but they are responsible for their own act in subjecting third parties, knowingly, to the danger stated. Having supervision, control, and operation of the building and its machinery, the use of the elevator must, as already intimated, be regarded as under their continuing order or command.

For nonfeasance an agent is responsible to his principal only. For misfeasance he may be responsible to third parties also. Nonfeasance is doing nothing. Misfeasance "is a failure to use, in the performance of a duty owing to the individual, that degree of care, skill, and diligence which the circumstances . . . reasonably demand." State use of Cardin v. McClellan, 113 Tenn. L.R.A.1918C.

616, 621, 85 S. W. 267, 3 Ann. Cas. 982. "It is often said in the books," writes the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, "that an agent is responsible to third persons for misfeasance only, and not for nonfeasance. And it is doubtless true that, if an agent never does anything towards carrying out his contract with his principal, but wholly omits and neglects to do so, the principal is the only person who can maintain any action against him for the nonfeasance. But if the agent once actually undertakes and enters upon the execution of a particular work, it is his duty to use reasonable care in the manner of executing it, so as not to cause any injury to third persons which may be the natural consequence of his acts; and he cannot, by abandoning its execution midway and leaving things in a dangerous condition, exempt himself from liability to any person who suffers injury by reason of his having so left them without proper safeguards. This is not nonfeasance, or doing nothing, but it is misfeasance, doing improperly." Osborne v. Morgan, 130 Mass. 103, 39 Am. Rep. 437. One or two illustrations from the decided cases will suffice. In Hagerty v. Montana Ore Purchasing Co. (Hagerty v. Wilson) 38 Mont. 69, 25 L.R.A.(N.S.) 356, 98 Pac. 643, it appeared that the defendant, superintendent of a mine, permitted a cage to be operated in a defective shaft, known by him to be defective, by means of which a third person unacquainted with the danger, in descending, was injured. He sued Wilson, and was met by the defense that the immediate cause of the accident was the negligence of the servant operating the cage, and that he was the servant not of Wilson, but of the mining company. The court held that Wilson was guilty of misfeasance in permitting the cage to be operated in view of the dangerous condition of the shaft, which contributed to the injury. In Consolidated Gas Co. v. Connor, 114 Md. 140, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 809, 78 Atl. 725, it appeared that a gas company was acting as agent of the city to keep its service pipes in repair from its mains to the city lamps. By reason of its failure to comply with this duty the gas, when turned in, escaped and injured a third party. It was held that this was misfeasance for which the gas company was responsible to the third party. See also Mayer v. Thompson-Hutchison Bldg. Co. 28 L.R.A. 433, and note (104 Ala. 611, 53 Am. St. Rep. 88, 16 So. 620) and note to Wines v. Crosby, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 1055. In Tippecanoe Loan & T. Co. v. Jester, 180 Ind. 357, L.R.A.1915E, 721, 101 N. E. 915, it was held that an agent in full control and management of an apartment house for the owners was personally liable to one having a right to use the passenger elevator, for injury to him from the negligence of the agent in respect to it. There is nothing in the foregoing in the least out of harmony with our cases, Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co. 94 Tenn. 397, 28 L.R.A. 421, 29 S. W. 361; Drake v. Hagan, 108 Tenn. 265, 67 S. W. 476; or Brown & Sons Lumber Co. v. Sessler, 128 Tenn. 665, 163 S. W. 812, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 103, 7 N. C. C. A. 614. The second of these was a case in which at most the agent was guilty of a mere nonfeasance. In Brown & Sons Lumber Co. v. Sessler, the manager or intermediate agent was guilty of no wrongdoing at all, but was sought to be held liable for the negligence of a subordinate servant. The court correctly held that the ultimate master was the responsible party, not a mere intermediate servant. In Nunnally v. Southern Iron Co., it was held that the officers of a corporation participating in its wrongdoing were guilty with it to a third party for an injury inflicted. It results that on this branch of the case the court of civil appeals is affirmed.

An order will therefore be entered reversing the Court of Civil Appeals on the first branch of the case, affirming it on the second branch, and remanding the cause to the Circuit Court of Davidson County for further proceedings.

The defendants will pay the costs of the appeal.

NORTHERN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

VAN DUSEN HARRINGTON COMPANY.

(245 Fed. 454.)

Equity — compelling transportation over connecting line.

Equity has no jurisdiction of a suit to compel a railroad company to transport a carload of wheat to a point on a connecting road as required by statute, since there is a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law.

Carland, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from an order of the district court assuming to act under its equitable jurisdiction, commanding the appellant to forthwith sign, issue, and deliver a bill of lading to appellee under which Northern Pacific car No. 19,482 will move to Evansville, Indiana. The order appealed from, while for all practical purposes a final order, was really an interlocutory mandatory injunction. The procedure leading up to the making of the order was as follows:

Upon the filing of a complaint on May 11, 1917, a subpoena was issued and served requiring the appellant to appear on May 19, 1917, to answer the same, and also to show cause why an order should not issue commanding the appellant to issue, sign, and deliver to the appellee a bill of lading as prayed for in the complaint. On the return day appellant appeared and filed a motion to dismiss the complaint upon the ground, among others, that the subject-matter of the action was not within the jurisdiction of a court of equity, for the reason that the complaint showed that appellee had a plain, adequate, and complete remedy at law. Affidavits were also filed by both parties in opposition to and in support of the order to show cause. After hearing argument the court granted the order, from which an appeal has been taken. So far as the record shows the main case is still pending in the court below on complaint and motion to dismiss. This statement is made for the purpose of showing that the case is not before us on pleadings and proofs, so that the merits of the controversy can be finally determined. We may, however, in determining the validity of the order appealed from, inquire as to whether the complaint states a cause of action cognizable in equity, as the objection made below that it does not is insisted upon here. The appellee states his cause of action as follows:

I. "That the complainant, the Van Dusen Harrington Company, is a corporation duly organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of Minnesota; that it is engaged in the business of buying, selling, and shipping grain."

II. "The defendant herein is a duly organized and existing corporation; that it operates lines of railroad in this state and other states; that it is a common carrier for hire."

III. "The complainant shows that on or about the 8th day of March, 1917, Mark P. Miller Milling Company delivered to the Northern Pacific Railway Company, the defendant herein, at Moscow, Idaho, Northern Pacific car No. 19,482, loaded with wheat consigned to Mark P. Miller Milling Company, Minneapolis, Minnesota; that the defendant accepted said car and undertook to transport the same in accordance with its duty as a common carrier and in accordance with all its duly filed and published rates L.R.A.1918C.

and tariffs; that the defendant issued and delivered to said Mark P. Miller Milling Company its negotiable order bill of lading, whereby it agreed to transport said car to Minneapolis, Minnesota, and there to deliver the same to the owner and holder of said bill of lading, or to deliver said car to such person or such place as the owner and holder of said bill of lading should duly designate; and that the defendant agreed and undertook to transport the said car in accordance with its duly filed and published tariffs, and in accordance with all the rules and provisions contained in said tariffs."

IV. "That said Mark P. Miller Milling Company sold said car to the Van Dusen Harrington Company, the complainant herein, and indorsed, delivered, and transferred to the complainant the aforementioned order bill of lading; that the complainant is now the owner of the contents of said Northern Pacific car No. 19,482, and is the owner of said negotiable order bill of lading."

V. "Complainant further shows that it desires to forward said car to Evansville, Indiana, over the lines of the defendant herein, and over the lines of other carriers that connect with defendant's lines."

VI. "That Northern Pacific Railway Company's Tariff No. 11-E, I. C. C. No. 6127, duly filed, published, and in effect under index 520, page 23, provides rates from Moscow, Idaho, to Minneapolis, St. Paul, East St. Louis, and other points beyond Minneapolis and St. Paul. That rule 46 of said tariff, found on page 22, provides as follows: 'Shipments may be diverted, reconsigned in transit, or held in transit for orders at points on the Northern Pacific Railway, Great Northern Railway, or Minneapolis, St. Paul, and Sault Ste. Marie (at rate in effect on date of shipment from original point to final destination), it being understood that point at which diversion is accomplished must be on direct line of movement point of origin of final destination.'"

VII. "That Northern Pacific Railway Company's Tariff No. 770-H, I. C. C. No. 5898, provides as follows: 'A change in destination, consignee, or routing will be permitted on all carload freight whether in transit or after arrival at original destination.'"

VIII. "That the Southern Railway Company's tariff issued by W. A. Cameron, Agent, No. 401-A, I. C. C. D-85, provides for proportional rates from St. Louis, East St. Louis, and other points to Evansville, Indiana, and that said Southern Railway Company connects with said defendant's rails and receives from defendant and transports freight delivered to it by defendant from St. Louis, East St. Louis and other points to Evansville, Indiana, and other points, and that said Southern Railway Company is now and at all times has been ready and willing to receive this particular car as well as other cars from said defendant at East St. Louis and transport the same to Evansville, Indiana."

IX. "Complainant further shows that it has repeatedly requested and demanded that the defendant sign, and deliver to the complainant a bill of lading in the form and with the provisions and contents of Exhibit A, hereto attached and hereby made a part of this complaint, or a bill of lading in any that the defendant agreed to allow said car ville, Indiana."

X. "Complainant further shows that the tariffs and rules of the defendant provide and agree that said car may be reconsigned at Minneapolis, Minnesota, to Evansville, Indiana, via East St. Louis, or to such other point as the owner may duly designate; that the defendant agreed to allow said car to be reconsigned at Minneapolis to Evansville, Indiana."

XI. "Complainant further shows that it has done all things necessary and in compliance with the published rules, regulations, tariffs, and provisions of the defendant in order to entitle complainant to consign and forward said car to Evansville, Indiana."

XII. "That the defendant, contrary to its duty as a common carrier, contrary to its contract, arbitrarily, illegally, and contrary to the laws and the statutes of the United States and the state of Minnesota, has repeatedly refused and still refuses to sign, issue, or deliver to the complainant a bill of lading in the form and with the contents and provisions as shown in Exhibit A, or a bill of lading in any proper form under which said car may move to Evansville, Indiana."

"In consideration whereof, and forasmuch as the complainant is remediless in the premises by the strict rules of the common law, and can only have relief in a court of equity, where this matter is properly cognizable and relievable, the complainant prays that your Honors will order the defendant to forthwith issue, sign, and deliver to this complainant a bill of lading in the form and with the contents and provisions as in Exhibit A, or bill of lading in such other proper form that this car may move thereunder to Evansville, Indiana. [Here follows prayer for subpoena and general relief.]"

Exhibit A, referred to in the complaint, was an ordinary bill of lading, whereby, if issued, the appellant agreed to carry the car of wheat mentioned in the complaint to Evansville, Indiana. We assume, without deciding, that the trial court had jurisdiction of the case as a Federal court under L.R.A.1918C.

the proviso of § 24 and paragraph 8 of the Judicial Code (Act March 3, 1911, chap. 231, 36 Stat. at L. 1092, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 991, ¶ 8). Coming to the question of the jurisdiction of the court below as a court of equity, we may quote the language used by Justice Van Devanter in Singer Sewing Mach. Co. v. Benedict, 229 U. S. 481, 57 L. ed. 1288, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 942: "In the courts of the United States it is a guiding rule that a bill in equity does not lie in any case where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. The statute so declares (Rev. Stat. § 723, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1244), and the decisions enforcing it are without number. If it be quite obvious that there is such a remedy, it is the duty of the court to interpose the objection sua sponte, and in other cases it is treated as waived, if not presented by the defendant in limine. Reynes v. Dumont, 130 U. S. 354, 395, 32 L. ed. 934, 945, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 486; Allen v. Pullman's Palace Car Co. 139 U. S. 658, 35 L. ed. 303, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 682. There was no waiver here. The objection was made by the demurrer, and again by the answer; and so, if it was well grounded, it was as available to the defendants in the circuit court of appeals to prevent a decree against them there as it was in the circuit court. Boise Artesian Hot & Cold Water Co. v. Boise City, 213 U. S. 276, 53 L. ed. 796, 29 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426."

In New York Guaranty & Indemnity Co. v. Memphis Water Co. 107 U. S. 205, 27 L. ed. 484, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 279, the Supreme Court in referring to Revised Statutes, § 723, now § 267, Judicial Code (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1244), said: "This enactment certainly means something."

We think it can be safely said that it means at least that the courts have not the power to dispense with the ancient rule of equity jurisdiction, which prohibits suits in equity where a plain, adequate, and complete remedy may be had at law. An inspection of the complaint fails to disclose a single ground of equitable jurisdiction. Reduced to its lowest terms, the complaint charges that the appellant is in possession of a carload of wheat belonging to appellee which it refuses to transport to Evansville, Indiana. The real nature of the case cannot be disguised by the fact that appellee is simply demanding the issuance of a bill of lading, for the reason that the bill of lading, once issued, would oblige the appellant to transport the car of wheat. It cannot be disputed but that an action at law for damages is a complete and adequate remedy for the refusal by a common carrier to transport a single carload of wheat. The damages to be recovered are easily ascertainable, and in the present case would be the difference between the value of the wheat at Minneapolis and at Evansville, Indiana, less expense of carriage. People ex rel. Ohlen v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. 22 Hun, 533.

Counsel for appellee in his brief, not content with sustaining the theory upon which the present action was brought, seeks to demonstrate that the action could have been brought and maintained on any one of four theories. The third theory advanced by counsel is stated in his brief as follows: "Thirdly. The complainant could have asked for a straight writ of mandamus to compel the issuance of the bill of lading, under the provisions of § 23 of the Interstate Commerce Act."

If the theory so stated is correct, then the question as to whether appellee had an adequate remedy at law is not open to question, as the proceeding by mandamus is a proceeding at law.

Counsel further states as the fourth theory on which the action might have been brought, that appellee could have asked for a mandatory order to compel the issuance of a bill of lading in compliance with § 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act (Act Feb. 4, 1887, chap. 104, 24 Stat. at L. 379), as amended (Act June 29, 1906, chap. 3591, § 7, §§ 11, 12, 34 Stat. at L. 595, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 8604a, 8604aa), commonly known as the "Carmack Amendment," and then he states that appellee adopted the fourth or possibly a combination of the third and fourth remedies. What is known as the Carmack Amendment is a part of § 20 of the Interstate Commerce Act, and it does provide for the issuance of a receipt or bill of lading by the receiving carrier, but no form of procedure is mentioned in § 20, except the district court is given jurisdiction upon the application of the Attorney General of the United States, at the request of the Interstate Commerce Commission, alleging a failure to comply with, or a violation of any of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, to issue a writ or writs of mandamus commanding the carrier to comply with the provisions of the act. This proceeding in equity finds no support in any of the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, and as we have before said, if § 23 applies, then the remedy at law is adequate.

Counsel for appellee further insists that a court of equity has jurisdiction to enforce a plain duty imposed by statute, and as he claims the Carmack Amendment imposed a plain duty upon the appellant in this case to issue a receipt or bill of lading, a court of equity in a proper case may compel it to do so. We think counsel has confused the jurisdiction of a court of equity to issue a mandatory injunction to enforce a plain statutory duty, where the court for other reasons has equitable jurisdiction, with the question as to whether the court in the present case had any jurisdiction in equity at all. A court of equity has no more authority to enforce a duty imposed by statute than it has to enforce a moral or contractual duty. It will enforce either or all in cases where it has jurisdiction.

We will now notice some of the cases cited by counsel for appellee which it is claimed decide that the present case is one of equitable jurisdiction. In the first place it may be said that this is not a case where a statute has given a right without furnishing a remedy. According to counsel's own argument, he had a remedy by mandamus. The case of Wiemer v. Louisville Water Co. 130 Fed. 251, is cited. This was a case where the court issued a mandatory injunction compelling the water company to furnish the complainants with water in accordance with its duty. We have no doubt but that the jurisdiction of a court of equity was properly exercised in this case; but it is no authority for the exercise of equity jurisdiction in the case at bar, as the facts are entirely different.

The case of Coe v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 3 Fed. 775, is cited as being in point. This was a case where Coe & Milson applied to the court for a mandatory injunction compelling the railroad company to accept and deliver any shipments tendered to it; but that is not the present case. There is only one car involved here, and no allegation that there will ever be another.

The case of Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (C. C.) 34 Fed. 481, is also cited. This was an action by one railroad company to compel another railroad company to handle its cars. Manifestly there was no adequate remedy at law, and the case furnishes no support for the position of appellee in the present case.

The case of Covington Stock-Yards Co. v. Keith, 139 U. S. 128, 35 L. ed. 73, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 461, is cited. In this case Keith, who was engaged in buying and selling live stock on commission as well as on his own account, brought the same to and shipped them from the city of Covington, Kentucky, over the Central Railroad. He owned certain live stock lots and yards in Covington, which were provided with all the necessary means of receiving, feeding, and caring for such stock as he purchased, or as might be consigned to him by others for sale; the receiver of the railroad tore up and rendered unsafe for use the connections which the railroad had with his stockyards. It was held that it was the duty of the railroad company to maintain these connections, and that a mandatory injunction would issue to compel the performance of the duty; but here the whole business of Keith was in jeopardy from day to day. Manifestly there was no adequate remedy at law.

The case of Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. 19 L.R.A. 387, 5 Intern. Com. Rep. 522, 54 Fed. 738, was a case where the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, a connection of the Toledo Railroad, refused to accept cars for transportation tendered it by the Toledo Railroad on the ground that the Pennsylvania employees, being union men, refused to handle cars from a non-union railroad. Manifestly this case is not authority for appellee. All the cases cited by the learned counsel are to the effect that, if a court of equity has jurisdiction of a case, it may in a proper case issue a mandatory injunction. It is further insisted that this court will take judicial notice of the fact that the refusal to forward the car in question, as well as many other cars, will cause a multiplicity of suits, which in itself is sufficient to sustain equitable jurisdiction. We have no reason to take judicial notice that there is or will be a refusal by appellant to forward any other cars of appellee, and, if we had, we cannot enlarge the facts stated in the complaint, and thereby enlarge the judgment which the court may render. The trial court dealt with one car, and that is all there is in the case. Moreover, the successful prosecution of the present action would not save a multiplicity of suits any more than an action at law, for the reason that the relief asked only affects one car, and the decree could not be broader than the complaint; so there is no merit in this contention.

The court below having no jurisdiction as a court of equity, we may not consider whether the complaint otherwise states a cause of action.

The order appealed from is reversed.

Annotation—Injunction to compel a carrier to transport freight.

Cases involving merely the right to injunction to require a carrier to furnish cars or facilities have been excluded. Cases passing upon the necessity of exhausting remedy before the Interstate Commerce Commission before resorting to the courts have also been excluded.

This note being concerned with a question of remedy, it does not purport to cover the substantive question as to the duty of the carrier to accept goods for transportation. One phase of that substantive question is presented in the notes in 40 L.R.A.(N.S.) 798, and 45 L.R.A.(N.S.) 120, on duty of carrier to accept liquor for transportation to points where its sale is prohibited or restricted.

A very few reported cases have passed upon the power of a court of equity to compel a carrier to transport freight.

As pointed out by the court in NORTHERN P. R. CO. v. VAN DUSEN HARRINGTON Co. ante, 883, it will be observed that the cases in which injunctions have been awarded involved more than a single shipment. No other case has been found containing a discussion of the power of a court of equity to award injunction in a case involving a single shipment only. Injunction to compel a carrier to receive and transport shipments of freight generally have been awarded where the refusal would cause irreparable damage to the shipper's business, on the ground that the remedy at law was inadequate, or L.R.A.1918C.

where a multiplicity of suits would be avoided. Likewise, injunctions have been awarded to compel a railroad company to handle the cars of a connecting carrier.

Thus, in Coe v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1880) 3 Fed. 775, set out and distinguished in NORTHERN P. R. CO. v. VAN DUSEN HARRINGTON Co. it was held that shippers maintaining a stockyard for the shipment and receipt of livestock were entitled to a mandatory injunction to prevent a railroad company from carrying out its threat to discontinue the practice of receiving and delivering shipments at the shippers' yards as it had done for many years, and to accept and deliver shipments of live stock in that locality only through the yards of a company about to erect a union stockyard, over the objection, first, that there was an adequate remedy at law, and, second, that no relief in the nature of a mandatory order to compel defendant to continue accommodations to the complainants ought to be made until the final hearing. The court said: "Complainants could, in the event defendant carries its threat into execution and withholds the accommodations claimed as their right, sue at law and recover damages for the wrong to be thus inflicted. But they could not, through any process used by courts of law, compel defendant to specifically perform its legal duty in the premises. And this imperfect redress could only be attained through a multiplicity of suits, to be prosecuted at great expense of money and labor; and then, after reaching the end through the harassing delays incident to such litigation, complainants' business would be destroyed, and the Union Stockyard Company, born of favoritism and fostered by an illegal and unjust discrimination, would be secure in its monopoly. Here an adequate remedy can be administered and a multiplicity of suits avoided. One other point remains to be noticed. Ought a mandatory order to issue upon this preliminary application? Clearly not, unless the urgency of the case demands it, and the rights of the parties are free from reasonable doubt. The duty which the complainants seek by this suit to enforce is one imposed and defined by law,—a duty of which the court has judicial knowledge. The injunction compelling its performance pending this controversy can do defendant no harm; whereas a suspension of accommodations would work inevitable and irreparable mischief to complainants. The injunction prayed for will therefore be issued."

And in Royal Brewing Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1914) 217 Fed. 146, it was held that a court of equity had jurisdiction to award an injunction to compel a carrier to receive and transport interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors in "dry" territory, where the complainant, a wholesale liquor dealer, alleged that defendant's refusal to transport the liquor will work irreparable damage to his business, which cannot be estimated in damages. Citing Louisville & N. R. Co. v. F. W. Cook Brewing Co. (1912) 223 U. S. 70, 56 L. ed. 355, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 189.

In the latter case the United States Supreme Court held that the objection that there was an adequate remedy at law where a carrier refused to accept interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors destined to local option or "dry" points in another state, and announced its purpose to persist in such refusals, comes too late, if ever available, when first made on appeal. Justice Lurton said: "The announced purpose of the railroad company to abjure its function and duty as a common carrier in respect of interstate shipments of all intoxicating liquors to localities in the state of Kentucky where the Kentucky local option prohibition laws prevailed threatened the ruin of complainants' business, and relief by injunction against such a continued course of conduct was certainly one which in such circumstances might be granted. Where the case is one in which, under any circumstances, relief in equity may be admissible, it is too late to say that there was an adequate remedy at law only upon review proceedings."

In Rogers Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Erie R. Co. (1869) 20 N. J. Eq. 379, it was held that a shipper was not entitled to a preliminary injunction before final hearing to compel a railroad company to transport goods at the established rates, but that an injunction would issue to prevent persons from entering into an agreement or from doing anything to prevent or hinder the railroad company from transporting the shipper's goods.

In the following cases injunctions were granted to compel a carrier to receive and transport interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors, without discussion as to the power of a court of equity to grant injunctions: Bluthenthal v. Southern R. Co. (1898) 84 Fed. 920; Crescent Liquor Co. v. Platt (1906) 148 Fed. 894.

And in the following cases injunctions to compel a carrier to transport interstate shipments of intoxicating liquors were denied upon the merits, without discussion as to the power of the court: Danciger v. Wells, F. & Co. (1907) 154 Fed. 379; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Danciger (1918) — C. C. A. —, 248 Fed. 36.

In Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania Co. (1893) 19 L.R.A. 387, 5 Inters. Com. Rep. 522, 54 Fed. 738, which is set out and distinguished in NORTHERN P. R. Co. v. VAN DUSEN HARRINGTON Co. ante, 883, a preliminary mandatory injunction was granted against a railroad company that threatened to refuse to interchange freight with the complainant, a connecting railroad, because of the refusal of its employees, who were union men, to handle cars of the complainant railroad company, whose employees were not union men. The court said: "The office of a preliminary injunction is to preserve the status quo until, upon final hearing, the court may grant full relief. . . . Now the normal condition, the status quo, between connecting common carriers under the Interstate Commerce Law, is a continuous passage of freight backward and forward between them, which each carrier has a right to enjoy without interruption, exactly as riparian owners have a right to the continuous flow of the stream without obstruction.

Since Lord Thurlow's time the preliminary mandatory injunction has been used to remove obstructions and keep clear the stream. Robinson v. Byron (1785) 1 Bro. Ch. 588, 28 Eng. Reprint, 1315; Lane v. Newdigate (1804) 10 Ves. Jr. 192, 32 Eng. Reprint, 818, 7 Revised Rep. 381. So an obstruction to the flow of interstate freight must be preliminarily enjoined, even though it requires a mandatory injunction. The quasi public nature of the duty to be performed by the common carriers and the irreparable character of the injury likely to result are ample grounds for this. The Interstate Commerce Law recognizes the necessity for such a remedy, for in summary equity proceedings at the instance of the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided by § 16, as amended in 1889, express power to issue injunctions, mandatory or otherwise, to prevent violations of the orders of the commission, is given to circuit courts. In addition to that, a remedy by mandamus in the district and circuit courts is given to an interested person to compel compliance by the common carrier with the provisions of the act. As this latter proceeding is denominated 'cumulative' in the statute, it does not prevent the remedy by injunction, nor would it in any event, because the inadequacy of the legal remedy, which justifies equitable intervention by injunction, is only the inadequacy of a recovery in damages by action at law. Atty.-Gen. v. Mid-Kent R. Co. (1867) L. R. 3 Ch. (Eng.) 100, 16 Week. Rep. 258."

And in Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1888) 34 Fed. 481, cited and distinguished in NORTHERN P. R. Co. v. VAN DUSEN HARRINGTON CO., a mandatory injunction was granted to compel a railroad company to handle the cars of another railroad company, upon the ground that the remedy at law was inadequate, although the defendant company alleged that its employees threatened to cease work if it handled the cars of the complainant company, whose employees had been ordered to strike. STATE OF KANSAS EX REL. BLANCHE
v.
ROBERT L. WOODS.

Bastardy — presumption of innocence.

1. In a bastardy proceeding, the instruction given to the jury that "the law presumes morality and uprightness until the contrary is made to appear from the evidence, and you are instructed that defendant in this case is presumed to be innocent of the charge made against him, and that presumption remains with him through all stages of the trial and until overcome by the evidence of the state by a preponderance of the credible evidence," is held not erroneous.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Chase County denying a motion for judgment notwithstanding a verdict for defendant, and overruling a motion for new trial in a bastardy proceeding. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Carpenter for the State.

Messrs. R. M. Hamer and H. E. Ganse, for appellee:

It is not error to instruct a jury trying an action for bastardy, in which the defendant denies the charge, that the defendant is presumed to be innocent until it has been proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence, that he is the father of the relatrix's child.

State ex rel. Bjorn v. Creager, 97 Kan. 334, 155 Pac. 29.

The record fails to show that the jury was actuated by passion or prejudice, but it does show that the jury did not believe the testimony of the relatrix and the witnesses who supported her. This clearly was within the province of the jury, and it was their sworn duty to return such a verdict as in their judgment the evidence warranted.

Howell v. Harper, 86 Kan. 396, 121 Pac. 362; Jevons v. Union P. R. Co. 70 Kan. 491, 78 Pac. 817, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 234; Cobe v. Coughlin Hardware Co. 83 Kan. 522, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126, 112 Pac. 115; Saindon v. Morrell, 78 Kan. 53, 95 Pac. 1056; Avery v. Union P. R. Co. 73 Kan. 563, 85 Pac. 600; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. L. A. Watkins Merchandise Co. 76 Kan. 813, 92 Pac. 1102; Harrod v. Latham Mercantile & Commercial Co. 77 Kan. 466, 95 Pac. 11.

Johnston, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In a complaint filed by Blanche Carmons she charged Robert L. Woods with the paternity of her child. A trial before a jury was had, and a finding was made by the jury and approved by the court that the defendant was not the father of the bastard child. On appeal complaint is made of an instruction that "the law presumes morality and uprightness until the contrary is made to appear from the evidence, and you are instructed that defendant in this case is presumed to be innocent of the charge made against him, and that presumption remains with him through all stages of the trial and until overcome by the evidence of the state by a preponderance of the credible evidence."

It is contended that as the proceedings in a prosecution for bastardy are governed by the rules regulating civil actions, there was no room for a presumption of innocence or good conduct, nor any justification for giving the instruction. In civil actions for wrong or fraud the party charged may ordinarily rest on the presumption of good faith and good conduct until something to the contrary is shown. In Baughman v. Penn. 33 Kan. 504, 508, 6 Pac. 892, it was held that "the law presumes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the business transactions of every man are done in good faith and for an honest purpose."

Where it was claimed that a railroad company had wrongfully built a railroad through the Indian Territory without right or license, it was held that there is no presumption that a party is a wrongdoer, but, in the absence of a contrary showing, the presumption is the reverse of that. Speer v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 23 Kan. 571, in an action to recover on a promissory note properly indorsed, the law presumes, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, that the holder has acquired it honestly, and that it was transferred to him because due and for value. Ecton v. Harlan, 20 Kan. 452. Many other cases might be cited to the effect that honesty and good conduct are to be presumed, both as to public officers L.R.A.1918C.

and private persons, where there is no evidence to the contrary. In ordinary negligence cases the rule is that the burden is upon the plaintiff to prove the negligence alleged, which is only a negative expression of the rule that the defendant is presumed to be free from negligence until a showing to the contrary is made. However, we have an authority more directly in point than any of those cited. In a bastardy proceeding it was said: "The law presumes morality and uprightness of conduct until the contrary is established, and it is not error to instruct the jury trying an action for bastardy, in which the defendant denies the charge, that the defendant is presumed to be innocent until it has been proved to the satisfaction of the jury by a preponderance of the evidence that he is the father of the relatrix's child." State ex rel. Bjorn v. Creager, 97 Kan. 334, 155 Pac. 29 (Syl. ¶ 3).

The similarity of the language used in the instruction in question indicates that this authority was before the court when the instruction was written, and it is clear that no error was committed in the giving of the instruction.

It is also insisted that the jury ignored the evidence given in behalf of the relatrix, and therefore the verdict should have been set aside. She gave testimony tending to show acts of intimacy with the defendant, and that he was the father of her child. Other testimony was given of admissions made by him to the same effect, but the jury appears to have deemed the evidence to be incredible. The defendant did not testify, and the only evidence offered in his behalf was to the effect that the period of gestation is ordinarily 280 days, whereas the child of the relatrix was born 261 days from the time of the alleged intercourse. It is insisted that as the testimony of the relatrix was not contradicted by the defendant nor directly disputed by other testimony, the verdict should have been set aside by the court. There was little opposing testimony, but the jury were not required to accredit testimony which they deemed to be unworthy of belief. In its instructions the court properly advised the jury, as is usually done, to the effect that if they believed any witness had wilfully testified falsely they might disregard all of the testimony of the witness, or so much of it as they believed to be untrue, and that this rule applied to witnesses whose testimony was not contradicted by that of other witnesses. Of course, jurors are not warranted in arbitrarily or capriciously rejecting the testimony of a witness, but should carefully and candidly give effect to that which is credible. No fixed rule can be laid down as to the test of credibility. It is a question for the jury to consider, and it has been decided that, although witnesses are not contradicted, a jury may discard their testimony if they honestly regard it to be unreliable. In Jevons v. Union P. R. Co. 70 Kan. 491, 497, 78 Pac. 819, 17 Am. Neg. Rep. 234, where strong evidence had been offered in support of an affirmative defense on which the court had directed a verdict, it was held that, the burden of proving the defense being upon defendant, "it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that the jury were bound to accept the evidence as true, even if not contradicted." In Cobe v. Coughlin Hardware Co. 83 Kan. 522, 525, 31 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1126, 112 Pac. 117, where it was insisted that there was no opposing testimony and the court should direct a verdict, it was said that "a court or jury is not required to accept a statement of a witness as conclusive, although there may be no direct evidence contradicting his statements, and hence the court could not direct the verdict."

In Howell v. Harper, 86 Kan. 396, 397, 121 Pac. 363, it was remarked that "it does not necessarily follow that a fact is established because testimony fairly tending to prove it is uncontradicted by direct opposing testimony. It cannot be said, as matter of law, that the jury (or court trying the fact) is bound to accept evidence as true, although not contradicted by direct evidence."

See also Harrod v. Latham Mercantile & Commercial Co. 77 Kan. 466, 95 Pac. 11; Saindon v. Morrell, 78 Kan. 53, 95 Pac. 1056; Fisk v. Neptune, 96 Kan. 16, 149 Pac. 692; Wyrick v. Parsons R. & Light Co. 100 Kan. 122, 163 Pac. 1059.

The court that watched the course of the trial and the appearance of the witnesses denied the motion of relatrix to give judgment against the defendant notwithstanding the verdict of the jury, and also overrules her motion for a new trial based upon the ground that the verdict was contrary to the evidence. No attack is made upon the jury and their conduct other than that they did not credit the testimony offered in behalf of the relatrix. Under the authorities cited, we cannot interfere with the approved finding of the jury, and therefore the judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Presumption and burden of proof in bastardy proceedings.

It is not intended to include in this note the question as to the proof necessary to establish the bastardy of a child born to a married woman. This is the subject of a note in 36 L.R.A.(N.S.) 255.

With a few exceptions the courts agree that a bastardy proceeding is a civil rather than a criminal proceeding, and the rules of evidence applicable to civil proceedings obtain; hence in establishing the guilt of the defendant, including the birth and parentage of the child, a preponderance of the evidence in favor of the prosecutrix is sufficient. Fay v. Reynolds (1891) 60 Conn. 217, 21 Atl. 418; E. N. E. v. State (1889) 25 Fla. 268, 6 So. 58; Cox v. People (1884) 109 Ill. 457; Lewis v. People (1876) 82 Ill. 104; *People v. It is not necessary that the evidence should establish the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. Bell v. State (1899) 124 Ala. 94, 27 So. 414; Holston v. State (1917) — Ala. App. —, 75 So. 175; E. N. E. v. State (1889) 25 Fla. 268, 6 So. 58; Semon v. People (1879) 42 Mich. 141, 3 N. W. 304; State v. Nichols (1882) 29 Minn. 357, 13 N. W. 153.

In a few jurisdictions, however, bastardy proceedings are regarded as criminal in their nature, and it is held that the guilt of the defendant must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt. Vail v. State (1897) 1 Penn. (Del.) 8, 39 Atl. 451; Norwood v. State (1876) 45 Md. 68; Sonnenberg v. State (1905) 124 Wis. 124, 102 N. W. 233; Van Tassel v. State (1884) 59 Wis. 351, 18 N. W. 329.

In New York it is held that, since a bastardy proceeding is quasi criminal, evidence of the defendant's guilt should be entirely satisfactory; and since the charge is so easy to make and so hard to defend, there should be careful scrutiny of the record. Drummond v. Dolan (1913) 155 App. Div. 449, 140 N. Y. Supp. 307; People ex rel. Mendelovich v. Abrahams (1904) 96 App. Div. 27, 88 N. Y. Supp. 924; Webb v. Hill (1909) 115 N. Y. Supp. 267.

In Alabama it is held that the evidence must reasonably satisfy the jury of the guilt of the defendant. White v. State (1911) 170 Ala. 1, 54 So. 430; Lusk v. State (1901) 129 Ala. 1, 30 So. 33; Miller v. State (1896) 110 Ala. 69, 20 So. 392.

The state need not show that no one else was the father of the child, it being sufficient in this regard to show that defendant was the father. Miller v. State (Ala.) supra.

Even where a preponderance of the evidence is held sufficient to establish the guilt of the defendant, it is the rule that unlawful sexual intercourse is not presumed from mere opportunity. Walker v. State (1908) 43 Ind. App. 605, 86 N. E. 502; State ex rel. Nusssear v. Breeden (1908) 41 Ind. App. 370, 83 N. E. 1020.

In determining the preponderance of the evidence, the jury should consider all of the presumptions which, according L.R.A.1918C.

to the ordinary course of events or according to the ordinary experience of human nature, arise out of the facts proved. Fay v. Reynolds (1891) 60 Conn. 217, 21 Atl. 418.

Under a statute providing that, upon a trial of the issue in a bastardy proceeding, the examination of the woman taken and returned shall be presumptive against the accused subject to be rebutted by other testimony which he may introduce, the burden of proof is upon the defendant after the affidavit of the prosecutrix is filed. State v. McDonald (1910) 152 N. C. 802, 67 S. E. 762; State v. Mitchell (1896) 119 N. C. 784, 25 S. E. 783, 1020; State v. Cagle (1894) 114 N. C. 835, 19 S. E. 766.

Where the defendant appeals to the sessions court from an order of affiliation of a bastard child, the burden is upon him to show cause why the order of affiliation should be set aside. Rex v. Knill (1810) 12 East, 50, 104 Eng. Reprint, 20.

Form of instruction.

Where the court instructed the jury that the guilt of the defendant must be proved by a preponderance of the evidence, it is not error to refuse further instructions which might lead the jury to infer that there was or might be something in addition for the plaintiff to do. Sutorious v. Stalder (1911) 88 Neb. 843, 130 N. W. 750. For example, it is not necessary further to charge the jury that, if the evidence is equally balanced, their verdict should be for defendant. Harper v. State (1884) 101 Ind. 109. Nor is it error to refuse, also, to instruct the jury that the presumption of law is that the defendant is innocent, and this presumption must be overcome or the defendant must be acquitted. Daly v. Melendy (1891) 32 Neb. 852, 49 N. W. 926. Or to refuse specifically to refer to the testimony of the prosecutrix, and instruct the jury to weigh her testimony with caution, or if the jury find her testimony to be untrue upon one point, they are at liberty to disregard her whole testimony. State v. Reese (1913) 43 Utah, 447, 135 Pac. 270. Compare with STATE EX REL. CARMONS v. WOODS, ante, 889, holding that it is not error to instruct the jury "that the law presumes morality and uprightness until the contrary is made to appear from the evidence, and you are instructed that defendant in this case is presumed to be innocent of the charge made against him, and that presumption remains with him through all stages of the trial and until overcome by the evidence of the state by a preponderance of the credible evidence."

It is proper to refuse to instruct the jury that if it is probable that the defendant is innocent he shall be acquitted. Holston v. State (1917) — Ala. App. —, 75 So. 175.

An instruction that the most convincing evidence was on the side of the people without reference to the number of witnesses is misleading and erroneous. People ex rel. Ray v. De Walt (1914) 188 Ill. App. 3. And it is error to instruct the jury to acquit the defendant if he has established by a preponderance of the evidence that he was not with the prosecutrix at the time and place she claimed the child was conceived. Eggleston v. Quinn (1908) 81 Neb. 457, 116 N. W. 166.

It is error to instruct the jury that it is not incumbent upon the people to show by a clear preponderance of the evidence that the defendant is the father of the child in question, but it is sufficient if the evidence creates probabilities in favor of that opinion, and the weight of the evidence inclines to that side of the question, although an instruction would not be error which requires the people to show the guilt of the defendant by a clear preponderance of the evidence. Peak v. People (1875) 76 Ill. 289. It is also erroneous to instruct the jury that the people are not required to prove the guilt of the defendant beyond a reasonable doubt. If by consideration of all of the evidence they are inclined to believe the defendant is the father of the child, then the jury should so find. Cox v. People (1884) 109 Ill. 457.

Where the prosecutrix testified to three different occasions on which she had sexual intercourse with the defendant, it is not error for the court to instruct the jury in substance that, if a preponderance of the evidence shows the defendant to be the father of the child, the date when the intercourse took place between the parties is immaterial. Handley v. People (1915) 196 Ill. App. 556.

Where under the case disclosed by the prosecutrix, in order for the defendant to be guilty, the child must have been of premature birth, it is error for the court to refuse so to instruct the jury as to clearly, unequivocally, and emphatically cast upon her the burden of showing that the child was prematurely born. Soucek v. Karr (1907) 78 Neb. 488, 111 N. W. 150. A. G. S.

A. J. McLEOD.

Tax — on extraction of turpentine — validity.

A tax of a certain amount per cup or box for the privilege of carrying on the business of extracting turpentine from standing trees is a property tax within the constitutional provision that taxes shall be equal and uniform and that property shall be taxed in proportion to its value, and when the land is already taxed it is invalid as double taxation.

A PPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Chancery Court for Hinds County overruling their demurrer to a bill filed to restrain them from levying and assessing a privilege tax on plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Stevens, J.:

Appellants are, respectively, auditor of public accounts and treasurer of the state of Mississippi, and prosecute this appeal from a decree of the chancery court of Hinds county, Mississippi, overruling their demurrer to a bill of complaint filed by appellee to restrain these officials from levying and assessing the tax attempted to be imposed by chapter 110, Laws of 1912, being "An Act to Levy and Collect and Enforce the Payment of an Annual Privilege Tax or Occupation Fee upon All Persons, Associations of Persons, or Business Firms and Corporations, Pursuing the Business of Extracting Turpentine from Standing Trees." Appellee is a resident and citizen of Hancock county, Mis-

Mississippi, and engaged extensively in the turpentine business. His bill of complaint is very lengthy, and it is unnecessary to set out the averments thereof in full. The material facts alleged are that complainant is the owner of several turpentine distilleries, and was, during the year preceding January 1, 1913, engaged in the extraction of sap and resin from a large number of pine trees, and transporting the same to his distilleries, and then and there distilling the crude gum or resin into the manufactured product called "turpentine;" that he was operating seventeen crops of turpentine on the trees, described in Exhibit A and A 1 to the bill, consisting of 170,000 boxes; that the land shown in Exhibit A belonged exclusively to the complainant, while the trees standing upon the lands described in Exhibit A 1 were leased to the complainant for the purpose and with the right to extract the crude turpentine; that the timber upon all of the lands mentioned had been duly assessed for ad valorem taxes and taxes paid thereon; that in extracting resin from trees the so-called turpentine crops last usually about three years, and during the first year about 50 per cent of the entire value of the use of the sap is extracted, about 30 per cent the second year, and 20 per cent the third year, and that after the third year the trees are generally of no value for the purpose of extracting resin, but that complainant, however, was operating about two crops tapped or cupped four years ago; that five crops were operated by complainant for the first time, five crops the second year, five crops the third year, and two crops the fourth year; that complainant in operating turpentine distilleries in the state of Mississippi was already paying a privilege tax for the right so to do and in accordance with the statutes of this state. The bill then charges that chapter 110, Laws of 1912, attempting to impose a so-called privilege tax for the right to extract turpentine from standing trees, is unconstitutional and void for many reasons therein alleged, one of which is that the enforcement of the provisions of said act would contravene § 112 of our state Constitution, the contention being that the tax here attempted to be imposed is a property tax, and not a privilege tax, and, being a property tax, it is not equal and uniform.

Section 1 of the act in question is as follows: "Be it enacted by the legislature of the state of Mississippi, that there is hereby levied on the gross annual cutting or extraction the following annual privilege tax or occupation fee for the year 1912, and for each subsequent year, upon each person, association of persons, or business firms and corporations, pursuing the business of extracting turpentine from standing trees. That for carrying on the business of extracting turpentine from standing trees the license shall be one fourth ( $\frac{1}{4}$ ) of 1 cent each year for each cup or box."

Other sections of this act require sworn statements to be made to the auditor by all persons, firms, and corporations affected by the act; these sworn statements to be rendered on or before the 1st day of February for the year ending December 31st next preceding. The statement required is "a sworn statement of the total extracting of turpentine." A penalty is imposed for failure to pay the tax, and the state treasurer is authorized to distrain the goods and chattels belonging to the person, firm, or corporation in default, and to sell a sufficient amount of the property of the taxpayer at public vendue to pay the taxes, together with 10 per cent thereon for each month for which the taxes remain unpaid: the moneys collected to be placed in the treasury to the credit of the general revenue fund of the state.

Mr. George H. Ethridge, Assistant Attorney General, for appellants.

Messrs. Green & Green, for appellee:

The lease or privilege of plaintiff constitutes property.

Stevens, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is conceded by counsel for the state that, if the tax here attempted to be imposed is a property tax, the act imposing it is unconstitutional and void. In following the rule, so frequently announced by the courts, of looking through the form to the substance, it is manifest that the tax exacted by the act under review operates, and can only operate, as a property tax, and is really not a privilege tax. We are not called upon to place any limitation upon the right of the state to exact licenses or impose privilege taxes that are really such, and to require the taxes as a condition precedent to the right to do business within the confines of our commonwealth. We do not question the right of the state, also, to measure a privilege tax by the volume or amount of business done. The act here assailed does not even attempt to require a license or permit to be issued by any officer or department of the government as a condition precedent to the right of a citizen to extract crude turpentine from pine trees. No document of any kind is to be issued in advance. The tax demanded by the act is to be paid at the end of the year and after the resin is extracted,—after the so-called privilege has been exercised. On default by the taxpayer, payment of the tax is enforced by seizure and sale of any property belonging to the defaulter. The enforcement of the tax conforms to the procedure adopted for the enforcement of ad valorem taxes. The act under review does not levy a privilege tax on the right or privilege of selling resin or the gum of the tree as originally extracted and commonly known as “crude;” but the privilege, if any, which is taxed, is the privilege or right of the owner or lessee of pine trees to “extract turpentine from standing trees.” Section 1 of the act makes no effort to conceal the subject-matter of the tax. It expressly declares that it is “levied on the gross annual cutting or extraction,” and the tax levied is “one fourth of 1 cent each year for each cup or box.” It is true the act in other language refers to it as a business—“a business of extracting turpentine from standing trees.” The imposition of such a tax is not on a business, but on the property involved. Here we have a citizen of our state who owns and operates his own turpentine distilleries, who owns the pine trees which produce the resin, the crude product, without which his distilleries cannot be operated, and although he pays ad valorem taxes upon his land and standing trees at their true value, and although he pays a privilege tax for the right to manufacture spirits of turpentine from the annual product of the trees, he is now called upon to pay an additional tax of one fourth of 1 cent on each box cut or chopped on the trees, and it requires no refinement to observe at once that this is an additional burden of taxation operating, not indirectly, but directly upon complainant's property. Here the legislature attempts to say to the citizen: “Although we recognize that you are the lawful lessee or owner of standing pine trees which produce when tapped an annual product of resin, and although we have demanded and you have paid your full share of taxes upon these standing pine trees and the soil which continually feeds them, nevertheless thou shalt not lay ax to the tree to extract the natural gum without subjecting any property which you have in the state of Mississippi to an additional tax of one fourth of a cent for each box you cut."

This act strikes down the inherent right of the property owner to lay hand upon his own property. Every owner of a pine tree enjoys the same natural right to extract gum from the tree as the owner of a vineyard has to pluck his own grapes. It would be the same thing to require a privilege tax as a precedent right of the owner to pull the ripe pecans from his pecan orchard, or to enjoy a drink of pure water from the cool spring of the old homestead. As stated, the levy is not imposed for the right to sell crude turpentine. If this were done, then anyone engaged in the regular business of buying and selling crude gum might be liable. The writer is not disposed to commit this court to any unnecessary process of reasoning in this opinion, but, having been born and reared amongst the tall, long-leaf pines of South Mississippi, is familiar therefore with the turpentine business, and feels safe in asserting that there is no well-defined business of buying and selling the crude turpentine. It is true that many individuals tap their own trees and sell the annual crude product to the distilleries. It is also true that the owner of the turpentine distillery, more familiarly known as the "still," frequently leases standing timber for the express purpose of boxing the trees for turpentine. In doing so, however, he is the owner either of the timber or of a valuable lease, generally referred to as a turpentine lease. It has been expressly decided by this court that a turpentine lease is a thing of value—"property," upon the value of which the state can levy and does levy an ad valorem tax.

The nature of this lease was properly characterized by our court in Harrison Naval Stores Co. v. Adams, 104 Miss. 392, 61 So. 417. In the language of the opinion by Reed, J., the court says that "the leases give the appellant the right to extract the crude gum from the pine trees, and then thereafter such product is manufactured in Harrison county into turpentine and resin."

And in Jones v. Adams, 104 Miss. 401, 61 So. 420, the court, again speaking by Reed, J., says: "The question before us is whether such turpentine lease is personal property, subject to taxation. It is understood that the lease gives a . . . L.R.A.1918C.

privilege to enter upon land for a term and extract gum or crude products from the pine trees, which is afterwards manufactured into what is known as naval stores. . . . Now, is it not property? It is subject to ownership, it has a value, and it may be bought and sold. It seems clear to us that it is property. From its very nature it is personal property. The lease or right or privilege which is owned by appellant, being personal property, is subject to be taxed as such."

There can, then, be no such thing as a valid and lawful turpentine lease without the right to extract the crude gum; and the case therefore falls clearly and squarely within the principle recently announced by this court in the companion case of Thompson v. Kreutzer, 112 Miss. 165, 72 So. 891, wherein our court, by Chief Justice Smith, observes that "a tax on an essential attribute of a thing is a tax on the thing itself," and "no tax can be imposed on the right of ownership which is not also a tax on property."

As stated by Chief Justice Marshall in Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat. 444, 6 L. ed. 687: "All must perceive that a tax on the sale of an article imported only for sale is a tax on the article itself."

And subsequently, in the case of New York ex rel. Burke v. Walls, 208 U. S. 21, 52 L. ed. 372, 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 193, the rule was again declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, with reference to imports, "that a state cannot, in the form of a license or otherwise, tax the right of the importer to sell."

In Brushaber v. Union P. R. Co. 240 U. S. 1, 60 L. ed. 493, L.R.A.1917D, 414, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 713, the Supreme Court of the United States, discussing the right of the Federal government to levy a direct tax without an apportionment, observes with reference to a tax on income and property: "Coming to consider the validity of the tax from this point of view, while not questioning at all that in common understanding it was direct merely on income and only indirect on property, it was held that, considering the substance of things, it was direct on property in a constitutional sense, since to burden an income by a tax was, from the point of substance, to burden the property from which the income was derived, and thus accomplish the very thing which the provision as to apportionment of direct taxes was adopted to prevent."

So, likewise, in Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 157 U. S. 558, 39 L. ed. 811, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 680, the court, by its chief justice, well says that "a tax upon property holders in respect of their estates, whether real or personal, or of the income yielded by such estates, and the payment of which cannot be avoided, are direct taxes," and "an annual tax upon the annual value or annual user of real estate appears to us the same in substance as an annual tax on the real estate, which would be paid out of the rent or income. This law taxes the income received from land and the growth or produce of the land. Mr. Justice Paterson observed in Hylton v. United States, 3 Dall. 171, 1 L. ed. 556, 'Land, independently of its produce, is of no value.' "

In the language of the distinguished Coke: "What is land but the profits thereof?" 1 Co. Litt. 45.

"A devise of the rents and profits or income of lands passes the land itself both at law and in equity." 1 Jarman, Wills, 5th ed. 789, and cases cited.

Following the reasoning of this court in Thompson v. Kreutzer, supra, there cannot be such a thing as a turpentine lease without an owner or lessee. If, then, you tax the lease itself with an ad valorem tax and at the same time exact tribute from the lessee in laying the ax to the tree, it is a case of double taxation pure and simple. There cannot be ownership of standing pine trees without an owner, and if you tax the standing trees with an ad valorem tax, and at the same time exact tribute from the owner as a condition precedent to his right to lay hands upon the tree, the state is imposing double taxation upon the tree itself. Section 112 of our Constitution solemnly declares that "taxation shall be uniform and equal throughout the state," and that "property shall be taxed in proportion to its value." If the tax here questioned can lawfully be imposed, then the legislature of our state in a desperate search for revenue can effectually brush aside the essential feature of equality and uniformity demanded by the Constitution. The provision that property shall be taxed in proportion to its value would be nullified, and the integrity of the Constitution itself destroyed. The legislature is here attempting to denominate private use of property as a public use. Appellee, in taking crude gum from his own trees, is not directly engaged in any kind of mercantile business. He does not bring his wares into the market place nor upon stock markets. He is upon his own private property pursuing a natural right.

"A legislature cannot make a private purpose a public purpose, or draw to itself or create the power to authorize a tax or a debt for such a purpose, by its mere fiat." Dodge v. Mission Twp. 54 L.R.A. 242, 46 C. C. A. 661, 107 Fed. 827.

within the principle announced by our court in Wilby v. State, 93 Miss. 769, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 677, 47 So. 465. At page 772 of 93 Miss., our court says: "Laws of this nature approximate an abridgment of the liberty of the citizen guaranteed to him by the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States, and should receive the strictest construction. Liberty, in its broad sense, must consist in the right to follow any of the ordinary callings of life without being trammelled."

The act under review does not undertake to make a distinction between the humble homesteader who taps a few trees by his own home and the large operator of many distilleries. No distinction can in fact be made. The liability here imposed is conclusively fixed at the root of the tree, and not at the market place. The poorest and most humble homesteader in the country might tap a few trees on his 40 acres, load a few barrels of crude turpentine, convey it to the distillery with a one-ox cart, and thereby subject himself to liability.

The conclusion of the whole matter, then, is that this tax operates necessarily and immediately as a property tax, and not as a privilege tax, and the statute imposing it violates § 112 of our Constitution, and the result reached by the learned Chancellor is eminently correct, and his decree is, accordingly affirmed.

Potter, J., dissenting:

I dissent from the majority opinion in this case. The statute under consideration puts a privilege tax on those engaged in the business of extracting turpentine from standing pine trees. The majority opinion in this case says that the statute is a "property tax," and does not put the tax in question on the business of extracting crude turpentine, but the statute, in plain English, says it does.

The majority opinion in this case says that the act under review does not levy a privilege tax on the right or privilege of selling resin, or the gum of the tree as originally extracted and commonly known as "crude." The tax, however, is upon those engaged in the business of extracting crude turpentine; and to engage in a business is to engage in an occupation for profit; and how else is a man who is engaged in extracting turpentine from trees to obtain a profit therefrom except by a sale of his products, either in its crude form or as a more highly manufactured article. The opinion in this case says that the tax in question is a tax on property. But the statute says that it is a tax upon the persons engaged in a particular line of business. That this tax is a tax on the business, and not on the property, is demonstrated by the fact that the tax imposed is not a lien on the property used in the business, and, if the business is carried on by another than the owner of the land, the owner is not personally liable for the tax.

It is said in the majority opinion that the defendant in this case has paid an ad valorem tax on his property, as the standing pine trees are part of the land and he has paid a tax on the land. That is true, but it does not prevent the state from imposing a privilege tax on persons engaged in a business for profit and using in their business the property taxed. Every merchant in the state pays an ad valorem tax on his stock of goods, but this does not exempt him from paying a privilege tax to sell the same goods. The owner of a cart pays an ad valorem tax on his cart, and, if he owns a mule, an ad valorem tax on his mule. He can use the cart and mule for his own purposes without paying a privilege tax on same. But if he uses this same cart and mule as a public dray for profit, he is required to pay a privilege tax. The statute in this case provides that the tax is upon the business of extracting crude turpentine. It is a revenue measure pure and simple, and the said tax is in no sense a tax on the property itself.

I know of no way to construe an unambiguous statute except by its plain terms. I take it that this statute means what it says, and its purposes could not be put in clearer language. The tax is on the occupation of "pursuing the business" of extracting turpentine from standing trees. The statute is designated a privilege tax in its title. I know of no good reason why every other occupation, from telling fortunes to running a railroad, can be taxed as a privilege, and the extensive business of extracting resin from pine trees cannot be so taxed.

The fact that this tax is measured by the number of trees taxed does not make the act invalid; for this only fixes the measure or the quantum of tax, just as the amount of stock carried in a grocery store fixes the amount of privilege tax to be charged; or the capacity of a press in an oil mill fixes the privilege tax to be charged upon the cotton seed oil business.

Cook, J., joins in this dissent.

Annotation—Privilege or occupation tax on rights issuing out of or connected with real property as a property tax within the constitutional provision.

A statute imposing what is denominated "an annual privilege tax or occupation fee" of 20 cents per acre upon each person or corporation owning or holding more than 1,000 acres of timber land or land in the state was held invalid as being a tax upon property, and not being in proportion to its value, in Thompson v. Kreutzer (1916) 112 Miss. 165, 72 So. 891.

A tax upon the gross value of the production of petroleum or other crude or mineral oil and of natural gas, in lieu of all other taxes, is held to be a property tax in Large Oil Co. v. Howard (1917) — Okla. —, L.R.A. —, —, 163 Pac. 537, and as such within the power of the state to impose, although the production is brought about through the instrumentality of a Federal agency.

A statute requiring a license for displaying upon real estate an advertisement containing more than 4 square feet of surface is sustained in State v. Murphy (1916) 90 Conn. 662, 98 Atl. 343. The court throughout the opinion treats the statute as imposing a tax, and in this character sustains its validity. L.R.A. 1918C.

A statute imposing a license tax upon persons, firms, or corporations engaged in the business of severing natural products, including all forms of timber, turpentine, and minerals, was construed in State v. Stiles (1915) 137 La. 539, 68 So. 947, as not imposing a tax upon the lessor of oil lands, consequently no question as to its constitutionality arose in the action, which was one against the lessor to recover the tax.

An ordinance containing similar provisions adopted by the police jury of a parish was before the court for construction in the case of Standard Oil Co. v. Red River Parish (1916) 140 La. 42, 72 So. 802, in an action by the lessee of oil lands to recover a tax paid thereunder. The validity of the legislation was sustained, but the point as to its being a property tax was not raised.

An act imposing a tax of a certain percentage on the gross products of any company or individual owning, controlling, or managing oil wells was sustained in Producers' Oil Co. v. Stephens (1907) 44 Tex. Civ. App. 327, 99 S. W. 157. The court said: "In our opinion the tax is not upon the gross products of the oil wells, but upon the occupation of owning, controlling, or managing oil wells producing oil, and the amount of the tax is measured by a percentage of the market value of the gross products." As thus construed, it is held not to violate any provision of the United States Constitution, as the legislature had the authority to single out and make classification for the purpose of levying occupation taxes. "And," the court continues, "although this law imposes an occupation tax upon the oil producers who pay an ad valorem tax upon the real estate producing oil, it does not constitute double taxation not permitted by the law, as it is within the authority of the legislature to impose an ad valorem tax on the oil-producing property of appellants and an occupation tax for the use of this property in the production of oil." A writ of error to this decision was denied by the supreme court of the state. This decision is approved in Texas Co. v. Stephens (1907) 100 Tex. 628, 103 S. W. 481.

A tax providing that, "in addition to the privilege license or tax required in this act, a further tax of 3 cents per barrel is hereby laid upon all oysters canned, packed, shipped, or sold in and from this state, and on all oysters caught and taken from the public reefs and private bedding grounds for packing, canning, shipping, or for sale. . . . This tax shall be paid for by the person, firm, or corporation first marketing the oysters," was held, in State v. Parker 5 Ala. App. 231, 59 So. 741, not to be a tax upon property, but a charge or imposition upon the business or act of marketing oysters.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Catawba County overruling a motion to nonsuit an action brought to recover damages for destruction of plaintiff's goods by flood, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Reversed.

The issues upon which the case was tried are as follows:

Were the plaintiff's goods destroyed by the negligence of the defendant? Answer: Yes.

If so, what damage are plaintiffs entitled to recover? Answer: $150.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. H. Marlon, W. C. Felmister, and M. H. Yount for appellant.

Messrs. D. L. Russell and R. H. Shuford for appellee.

Brown, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The evidence tends to prove that plaintiff was employed by defendant as an assistant coal heaver at its coal chute at Cliffs, a station on Catawba river. By permission of defendant, plaintiff and his family occupied as a residence two unused shanty cars located on a sidetrack near the chute. They lived in the cars with their household effects from May 1 to July 16, 1915. On that night an unprecedented flood swept over the banks of the Catawba, submerged the shanty cars, and destroyed plaintiff's property therein.

The evidence shows that during the day of the 16th, before the water reached the track on which the shanties were located, a freight train in charge of conductor Winkler passed Cliffs going towards Hickory. Nothing was said to Winkler by the plaintiff, Matthews, or by Askew, his foreman, about moving the cars. After the freight train passed in the afternoon, Askew, plaintiff's brother-in-law, phoned the defendant's shops at Hickory, and requested that an engine be sent out to move the shanty cars. At that time the water had not reached the shanties. He was told that there was only one engine there and that had to be held on account of a washout on the line at another point. It had required Winkler from 2:30 until 6 o'clock that same afternoon to get his train from Cliffs to Hickory, a distance of 2 or 3 miles.

The court overruled a motion to nonsuit, which is assigned as error. The exception is well taken. We know of no principle of law that imposed upon the defendant the legal duty to protect and rescue plaintiff's chattels from the destructive consequences of an act of God. The plaintiff was occupying the shanty cars as a residence by permission of defendant. His relation to defendant was that of a servant who has brought his effects upon the master's premises by his permission, the servant retaining personal control of his property. The law imposes no duty upon the master to rescue his servant's goods from the consequences of a destructive agency for which the master was in no way responsible. The cause of the destruction was the act of God, and not that of the master. 1 Labatt, Mast. & S. 15. The rule is thus stated by the Georgia court in Allen v. Hixson, 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810: "When an employee, without fault on the master's part, becomes placed in a dangerous or painful situation, the master is under no positive legal duty of exercising all reasonable care and diligence to effect such employee's speedy release. Being in no way responsible for the unfortunate occurrence, the master cannot be said to be guilty of a tort if he does not promptly take active steps in coming to the rescue. The only duty arising under such circumstances is one of humanity, and for a breach thereof the law does not, so far as we are informed, impose any liability." 24 Cyc. 1072, and notes, and note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 363.

To illustrate: Suppose plaintiff had been a farmer's tenant residing in a tenant house on the banks of the Catawba, and when the flood began to rise he had telephoned his landlord to bring his team and remove his household goods, and the landlord had failed to do so. Would the landlord be liable? Certainly not. The law imposes no such duty on him, although humanity did. Causes of action arise only for violations of duties imposed by municipal law. Unfortunately for plaintiff, he failed to have his cars attached to Winkler's freight train as he could have done, and when he phoned to Hickory for help, the defendant's only engine there was necessarily detained to meet another pressing demand. Had this not been so, we doubt not that it would have been sent to plaintiff's relief.

The position that defendant may be held as a bailee of the household goods is untenable. Possession and control are essential elements in the law of bailment. The defendant was not in possession of the goods simply because they were in its shanty cars, any more than a landlord would be in possession of his tenant's household effects simply because he had furnished the tenant a house to live in. 6 C. J. 1102.

The motion to nonsuit is allowed.

Reversed.

Annotation—Duty and liability of master as to goods of servant who lives on the premises.

Research has disclosed no case precisely in point with MATTHEWS v. CAROLINA & N. W. R. Co. ante, 899. The decision in that case, however, appears sound. Although not strictly in point, attention is called to the case of Doyle v. Union P. R. Co. (1893) 147 U. S. 413, 37 L. ed. 223, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 333, because of the somewhat analogous situation involved. That was an action for personal injuries and for death of the plaintiff's children by a snowslide. The parties were living in a section house near the base of a high and steep mountain, in a place subject to snowslides and dangerous on that account; the plaintiff had made an agreement with the railroad company to occupy the section house and board section hands and other employees of the company as it desired, at a certain rate which was to be paid by the employees, but which the company agreed to retain from their wages in order to aid her in collecting for the board. It was held that the relation was that of landlord and tenant, and that the company was not liable although it was aware of the danger, of which the plaintiff was ignorant, and did not notify her thereof.

The case of Allen v. Hixson (1900) 111 Ga. 460, 36 S. E. 810, which is cited in MATTHEWS v. CAROLINA & N. W. R. Co., was also a personal injury case, and the language of the court supports apparently the rule applied in the MATTHEWS CASE. But it will be seen from an examination of the note to Raasch v. Elite Laundry Co. 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 940, on the question of the duty of the master to relieve a servant who, without the master's fault, has been caught in a dangerous situation, in which the Hixson Case is cited, that that case does not represent the unanimous view of the authorities on the question.

As to occupation of premises as a servant and as a tenant, see the note to Bourland v. McKnight & Bro. 4 L.R.A.(N.S.) 698. And see Minneapolis Iron Store Co. v. Branum, L.R.A.1917E, 298, and other cases cited in the footnote.

Robb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a judgment of the supreme court of the District of Columbia upon a verdict for the plaintiff, appellee here, in an action upon a note for $500 payable to the order of Thomas F. McNulty and, before maturity, indorsed by him to the plaintiff for value.

There is practically no dispute as to the facts, and but one question is presented for review. McNulty was the owner of a distillery in Baltimore. He sold his business to the plaintiff corporation and became one of its vice presidents and its general manager for the District of Columbia. His credits did not pass in said sale, but remained his individual property. Among those credits was a promissory note of Thomas F. Fay for $1,900, secured by deed of trust upon Fay's retail liquor business in this city, which included barroom license and fixtures. After the sale of his business to the plaintiff, McNulty was proceeding to collect payment of said Fay note by foreclosure sale under said deed of trust, when a conference was had between officers of defendant corporation and himself. Fay being also indebted to the defendant and its lien being subordinate to the lien of McNulty, and it being evident that a sale under the first trust would exhaust the security and leave the defendant without any security, it was agreed that one Pach, who was well known to the defendant, should become the purchaser at the trust sale; that McNulty would accept in liquidation of his claim $500 in cash, to be paid by the defendant, as Pach had no money; a ninety-day note in the same amount to be made by the defendant and a $1,200 note to be made by Pach, secured by a first trust on the business. The defendant was to take a second trust to secure Fay's indebtedness to it, which indebtedness Pach was to assume. The defendant contends, and its testimony tended to show, that McNulty promised, in consideration of this arrangement, that he would extend credit to the extent of $500 to Pach that he might get started in his business, and that the defendant was to extend a like credit. The testimony of the plaintiff tended to show that after the terms upon which Pach was to purchase the business had been agreed upon, and independently of that agreement, McNulty suggested the advisability of extending credit to Pach. There was no dispute that McNulty, when he received the note in suit, immediately indorsed it to the plaintiff for value and without informing plaintiff of the conversation or arrangement as to credit to Pach.

The defendant asked the court to instruct the jury that the plaintiff "was chargeable with knowledge, imputed knowledge, or notice of whatever Mr. McNulty knew" in reference to the consideration for this note. This instruction the court refused to give, but did charge on that branch of the case as follows: "Now, in this case, the note is not made by Pach, but is made by the Arlington Brewing Company and payable to Mr. McNulty, but he has assigned it to the plaintiff in this case, Bluethenthal & Bickart. Now if Bluethenthal & Bickart knew nothing about the transaction between these parties, and gave the money for it in good faith, before the note matured, and without notice of any impairment of the consideration of that note when they bought it, they are entitled to recover, no matter what was the consideration as between Mr.

McNulty and the brewing company, unless you find that McNulty really was, when he took the note, acting for the plaintiff in this case, Bluethenthal & Bickart."

It was not error for the court to refuse to charge as requested. McNulty was not the agent of the plaintiff in obtaining this note, nor was he acting for the plaintiff when he indorsed the note to it. It is apparent, therefore, that the rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal, not only as to knowledge acquired by the agent in the particular transaction, but to knowledge acquired by him in a prior transaction and still in his mind at the time of his acting as such agent, if the agent is at liberty to communicate such knowledge to the principal (Distilled Spirits (Harrington v. United States) 11 Wall. 356, 20 L. ed. 167), does not apply in this case. Here McNulty, an officer of the corporation, was dealing with and not for his principal, and if there was a failure of consideration for the note which he assigned to the plaintiff, and he concealed that fact from it or failed to inform it of that fact, his knowledge in such a situation is not imputable to the plaintiff. Innerarity v. Merchants' Nat. Bank, 139 Mass. 332, 52 Am. Rep. 710, 1 N. E. 282; Winchester v. Baltimore & S. R. Co. 4 Md. 231. The interests of McNulty, when he indorsed this note to the plaintiff in part liquidation of his indebtedness to it, were antagonistic to its interests. His position as to that transaction was that of a stranger, and knowledge which he possessed and did not disclose cannot be imputed to the plaintiff.

The judgment is affirmed with costs.

Annotation.—Agent's knowledge of defense to bill or note belonging to him and indorsed or transferred by him to his principal, as affecting the latter's character as a bona fide holder.

The general principle that notice to one acting as agent for another, of a fact within the scope of his authority, is imputable to the principal, is well settled. To this general principle there is an exception as well settled as the rule itself, that knowledge of an agent is not imputable to his principal when, in the transaction involving the matter to which the knowledge relates, the agent occupied a position antagonistic to his principal, or in other words was dealing with, not for, his principal. Various phases of this exception to the general rule have been discussed in the notes in this series of reports.<sup>1</sup> committing an independent fraudulent act on his own account.

See note to Brookhouse v. Union Pub. Co. 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 993, as to whether a principal is chargeable with knowledge acquired by his agent, when the agent is engaged in L.R.A.1918C.

The converse, that is, whether an officer or employee of a corporation is chargeable with its knowledge of infirmities in commercial paper purchased from it, is discussed in the note to McCarty v. Keprata, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 65, and the supplementary note thereto to Hardin v. Dale, L.R.A.1915D, 1099.

The present note involves the application of this exception to a limited class of cases; viz., cases passing upon the question whether a principal is chargeable with the knowledge of an agent of defenses to a bill or note owned by the agent and indorsed or transferred by him to his principal, so as to preclude the principal from becoming a bona fide holder thereof. It is assumed that the principal is a purchaser for value before maturity without any actual knowledge of defenses to the note.<sup>1a</sup> The present note has been confined to cases of transfer of notes owned by the agent in his individual capacity. It does not include the question whether a principal is chargeable with the agent's knowledge of defenses to paper owned by a firm or corporation of which the agent is a member, which the agent representing such owner transfers to his principal.

The exception to the general rule above referred to is peculiarly applicable to situations such as was involved in ARLINGTON BREWING CO. v. BLUETHENTHAL & BICKART, ante, 901, where on the very face of the transaction the agent appears as the party with whom the principal is dealing. To charge the principal with the agent's knowledge in such a situation would render it unsafe for a principal to deal with an agent. It is quite generally held that the agent's knowledge of defenses to a bill or note is not imputable to the principal so as to prevent the principal becoming a bona fide holder, where, in the transaction in which the bill or note is transferred or indorsed, the agent is acting for himself, and the principal is represented by another or acts for himself.<sup>2</sup> Notice is sought to be imputed most frequently in dealings between a corporation and its officers or agent. In accord with the rule as above stated, the corporation is held not chargeable with knowledge of defenses possessed by the corporate officer.<sup>3</sup> The reason most frequently given for this decision is that in the transaction in which the transfer or indorsement was made the agent was acting for himself. In other words the officer is not the agent of the corporation in

A. 1, 178 Fed. 53, holding a bank not chargeable with knowledge of its president and a director of defenses to a note sold by the officers to the bank, where such officials took no part in the negotiation in behalf of the bank in making the purchase.

A bank was held not chargeable with knowledge of fraud possessed by its cashier in notes transferred to the bank, in First Nat. Bank v. Bevin (1900) 72 Conn. 666, 45 Atl. 954. In one part of the opinion the notes are stated to have been transferred by the cashier to the bank as security for a loan; in another part of the opinion the notes are stated to have been transferred to the bank by a third party. Whether the cashier was acting for the third person is not clear.

In Louisiana State Bank v. Senecal (1839) 13 La. 525, a bank was held not chargeable with knowledge of defenses possessed by a director, to a note which had been given upon a sale of property of the director's wife, and delivered to the director, who discounted it at the bank.

A bank which was the payee of a note delivered to its president for the purpose of enabling him to discount it and use the proceeds for a specified purpose was held, in First Nat. Bank v. Persall (1910) 110 Minn. 333, 136 Am. St. Rep. 499, 125 N. W. 506, 675, not chargeable with knowledge possessed by its president, who discounted the note at the bank and was credited with the amount thereof. And it having shown that the bank gave a valuable consideration for the note and accepted it in good faith before maturity, it was held a bona fide holder.

A bank was held chargeable, in Messick v. Roxbury (1854) 1 Handy (Ohio) 190, with knowledge of its cashier of defenses to a note which at one time was owned by the cashier personally; but the facts are obscurely stated and it is not clear that it was transferred directly from the cashier to the bank.

In Kauffman v. Robey (1883) 60 Tex. 308, 48 Am. Rep. 264, one who was an agent for several parties held notes as collateral security for a debt owing one of his principals; subsequently, an agreement was made by which the note thus held as collateral was transferred to another of the principals, who was the plaintiff in the action. The plaintiff was held not chargeable with knowledge of defenses to the note acquired by the agent when acting for his other principal.

In Hawkins v. First Nat. Bank (1915) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 175 S. W. 163, where the president of a bank took the note of a third person, apparently payable to the bank, for money owing by the president to the bank, the court, in refusing to charge the bank with knowledge of defenses possessed by the president, states that, if the president took the note in question to evidence a debt that he himself was owing the bank, his interest would be adverse to that of the bank, and the general rule that notice to the agent is notice to the principal does not apply.

A corporation was held not chargeable with knowledge of defenses to a draft indorsed by a corporate officer who was payee therein to the corporation. Levy & C. Mule Co. v. Kauffman (1902) 52 C. C. A. 126, 114 Fed. 170. It does not appear whether the corporation was represented by any other officer than the payee of the draft; if not, the case would seem to fall within the rule discussed below in cases in which the officer was the sole representative.

It is stated obiter in Tilden v. Barnard (1880) 43 Mich. 376, 38 Am. Rep. 197, 5 N. W. 420, that if a note signed by the cashier as one of the makers thereof, and payable to the cashier as payee in the note, was at any time negotiated to the bank of which the maker and payee was cashier, the bank would not be a bona fide holder.

The mere fact that one who discounted a note at a bank was a director thereof does not charge the bank with knowledge possessed by him. Washington Bank v. Lewis (1839) 22 Pick (Mass.) 24. It is stated that, in applying for the discount, he did not act as director, nor could he with any propriety so act; he was the party with whom the bank contracted in discounting the note and to whom the money was paid.

acting for himself in thus transacting business with the principal will communicate his knowledge to his principal.<sup>5</sup> It is stated in one case that, while the general doctrine is recognized that the principal is charged with notice of what an agent knows in transactions where said agent is acting for the principal, yet a bank director, "in asking for a discount of his own paper, is not an agent of the bank, but acting as the adverse contracting party. Were this held otherwise, no bank could discount paper to which a director is a party, without losing the position of an innocent indorsee for value under the law merchant. Hence no bank could have dealings in commercial paper with any of its directors on ordinary business principles."<sup>6</sup> In a case involving the sale of a note by the president of a bank to the bank, it is stated that "a bank officer who offers to his bank a note for discount is to be regarded in that transaction as a stranger, and the bank is not chargeable with the officer's knowledge of fraud or want of consideration for the note."<sup>7</sup>

As shown above, the corporation has usually been represented by another officer or agent in purchasing the note. The fact that the corporation is thus represented by another agent is emphasized. It has been stated, in a case in which the knowledge of the president of a bank was sought to be imputed to the bank, that, if he alone had acted in discounting the note and in placing the proceeds to his own credit, the bank would be bound by his knowledge.<sup>8</sup> That the bank is not chargeable with knowledge of its officer of defenses to a note indorsed or transferred by him to it has been held true, although the officer was present and acting as a member of the discount committee when his note was discounted.<sup>9</sup> It has been held, however, that a bank is chargeable with (1839) 13 La. 525, where a bank was held not chargeable with knowledge of its director of defenses to a note indorsed by him to it, the court states that, if this knowledge had been brought home to the president or cashier, the bank would be chargeable therewith, and continues: "But directors are not officers of a bank in the proper sense of the word, nor have they individually any power or control in the management of its concerns; they act collectively, and at stated times, and have otherwise no more to do with the general management of the institution than the other stockholders. The director in this instance had a direct interest in suppressing the information he possessed; and it would be extending constructive notices beyond all reasonable bounds to say that the plaintiffs must be held cognizant of facts which are proved to have been intentionally concealed from them by a person who, individually, was neither their officer nor their agent."

The court in Hummel v. Bank of Monroe (1888) 75 Iowa, 689, 37 N. W. 954, made an exception to the general rule that notice to the agent is imputable to the principal, where circumstances make it probable that the agent will not communicate his knowledge or information to his principal, and states, with reference to the facts in the case at bar, that, if the cashier had communicated to the bank the facts within his knowledge before receiving the benefit which accrued to him under the transaction, all the objects which he had in view would have been defeated; that there is no probability that the bank would with that knowledge have taken the draft and thereby incurred the liability.

<sup>9</sup> Terrell v. Branch Bank (1847) 12 Ala. 502, holding a bank not chargeable with knowledge of a director that paper offered by him to the bank for discount for his own purposes was received by him in blank from a customer of the bank for the purpose of renewing a note held by the bank against such customer, the note being filled up by the director for a much larger amount than was authorized, and negotiated to the bank as above stated.

A bank has been held not chargeable with knowledge possessed by its president of defenses to a note which he sold to the bank, although the president, together with the cashier, constituted the discount committee, and it seems acted for the bank in the transaction in which the note was purchased by it. The court states that the president did not act at all for the bank, that his conduct was actuated wholly by personal reasons, "and if he knew that he was taking part in an unlawful transaction, the bank cannot be charged by his guilty participation." Graham v. Orange County Nat. Bank (1896) 59 N. J. L. 225, 35 Atl. 1053.

A bank was held not chargeable with knowledge of a director in Custer v. Tompkins County Bank (1848) 9 Pa. 27, where the director appeared as an indorser on the note. It does not appear, however, that he was an indorser in regular course and transferred the note to the bank. In holding the corporation not chargeable with notice, the court states that notice to the director is not notice to the corporation unless he constitutes an organ of communication between it and those who deal with it. Although the director was present when the note was discounted, the court states notice of the fraudulent diversion of the proceeds of a bill intrusted by the drawer to a director to be discounted for the drawer, where the director put his own name upon the bill and discounted it for himself, acting as a member of the discount committee in making the discount.<sup>10</sup>

An exception to the exception that a principal is not chargeable with the agent's knowledge where the agent is acting for himself is made in some cases of corporate agents in which the agent is the sole representative of the corporation. In such a case it has been held that the corporation is chargeable with the agent's knowledge.<sup>11</sup> Likewise, if the agent is an essential representative of the corporation the corporation is chargeable.<sup>12</sup> A corporation has not, however, in all instances, been held chargeable with knowledge of its officer who alone represents the corporation in the transfer of negotiable paper that he was not such an organ of communication.

In Tagg v. Tennessee Nat. Bank (1872) 9 Heisk. (Tenn.) 479, a bank is held chargeable with knowledge of defenses to a note transferred to it by its president, who it seems was the sole agent of the bank; at least he acted on behalf of the bank in making the transfer.

Grebe v. Swords (1914) 28 N. D. 330, 149 N. W. 126, holding a bank chargeable with knowledge of its cashier of defenses of a note indorsed by him to it, where he alone acted for the bank in the transaction.

First Nat. Bank v. Burns (1913) 88 Ohio St. 434, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 764, 103 N. E. 93, holding a bank chargeable with the knowledge of its president and active manager of defenses to a note sold and discounted by him to the bank, where he acted for the bank as its president and manager, and no other officer or person connected with the bank had anything to do with the purchase of the notes.

First Nat. Bank v. Blake (1894) 60 Fed. 78, holding a bank chargeable with knowledge of its president of defenses to a note executed to the president, and by him transferred to the bank, where he was the sole representative of the bank in the transaction.

In Black Hills Nat. Bank v. Kellogg (1893) 4 S. D. 312, 56 N. W. 1071, a note payable to the cashier of a bank had been by him assigned to the bank; subsequently, the maker executed a renewal directly to the bank, the cashier transacting the entire L.R.A.1918C.

to it. Thus, a bank which cashed a draft for its cashier is held not chargeable with the knowledge of its cashier that the draft was the proceeds of a note secured by him by fraudulent means, and sold to another bank.<sup>13</sup> The effect of a corporate agent being the sole representative of the corporation has been discussed in a note in this series of reports, and reference should be had thereto for a full discussion of this question.<sup>14</sup>

The classes of cases to which this note is confined must be distinguished from cases in which the agent is merely transferring to his principal a note which, although taken in the agent's name, was taken in the course of the principal's business, and which in reality belonged to the principal. It seems clear that in such a case the principal is chargeable with knowledge of the agent of defenses to the note, and so it has been held.<sup>15</sup> A principal to whom a note is indorsed

See Tagg v. Tennessee Nat. Bank (Tenn.) supra.

<sup>12</sup> In Le Duc v. Moore (1892) 111 N. C. 516, 15 S. E. 888, where it was sought to charge a bank with knowledge of its president of defenses to a note which he indorsed to the bank for his own benefit, it appeared that the president and cashier alone constituted the discount committee, and it required the active official participation of the president in order to discount the papers. The bank was accordingly held chargeable with his knowledge.

<sup>13</sup> Hummel v. Bank of Monroe (1888) 75 Iowa, 689, 37 N. W. 954. The action in this case was against the bank by the maker of the note, who had been compelled to pay the same, on the theory that, as the note was obtained by fraud, the maker had a lien upon the proceeds in the cashier's hands for his indemnity, and that he might pursue the proceeds in the hands of any person who received them from the cashier with notice of his right, and that the bank was charged with knowledge of the fact out of which the maker's lien or ownership to the draft arose by the knowledge of its cashier.

A bank for which a debtor executes a chattel mortgage on a stock of goods, and by his agent, who, upon purchasing the same for his principal, took an indorsement from the seller to himself, is chargeable with knowledge possessed by his agent.<sup>16</sup> It has been held in the case of a note given to the local agent of a life insurance company in payment of a premium on a policy to be issued to the maker, that the state agent to whom the note was indorsed by the local agent was not charged with all the knowledge possessed by the local agent with reference to the note, where the state agent took the note in his individual capacity, and not as agent for the company. The defense in this case was that the policy afterwards issued by the life insurance company did not correspond to the representations of the agent. The court holds that, if the state agent, when he bought the note in his individual capacity for value and before maturity, also held an application by the maker of the note for a certain policy, and if the policy actually issued and delivered to the applicant was one exactly of the kind described in the application, the maker could not set up in defense to an action by the state agent in his individual capacity fraud on the part of the local agent in inducing him to sign the application.<sup>17</sup> The present discussion does not deal in general with cases such as are referred to in this paragraph.

BEAR CAT MINING COMPANY, Plf. in Err.,
v.

GRASSELLI CHEMICAL COMPANY.

Damages — minimizing — trifling cost.

The damages which a lessee of a mine can recover because of the breach by his sublessee of his contract to keep the water pumped out of the mine, after notice of intention to surrender the sublease, but before the surrender day, by reason of which the owner forfeits the lease, is not the value of the leasehold, since it was his duty to bear the trifling cost necessary to protest his lease.

(December 27, 1917.)

ERROR to the District Court of the United States for the Western District of Missouri, Van Valkenburgh, District Judge, to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for nominal damages only, in an action brought to recover damages for failure of defendant to comply with the terms of his sublease of a mine. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Hook and Smith, Circuit Judges, and Amidon, District Judge.

Messrs. John S. Marley and Albert S. Marley, for plaintiff in error:

The burden of proving that damages could have been prevented by the injured party at a nominal cost rested upon the wrongdoer, the Grasselli Chemical Company.

The duty to minimize damages can only arise where the injured party is in a position to do so and the wrongdoer is at a helpless disadvantage.

The question of possession is the true test by which the liability of one or the other is determined, and that possession and equal knowledge being in the defendant company, the duty to act was exactly where the contract placed it.

Leonard*, 46 Kan. 354, 26 Am. St. Rep. 101, 26 Pac. 717.

Messrs. George J. Grayston and A. E. Spencer, for defendant in error:

The damages to be recovered in actions of this character are such as are the direct, immediate, and proximate consequence of defendant's act or neglect. And where plaintiff knows of defendant's breach or default, it is the former's duty to minimize the damages, and so far as he can avoid or lessen this damage by reasonable expense or exertion on his part, it is his duty so to do; if he fails in this, he cannot recover for the damage he might thus have avoided.

Amidon, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The plaintiff, the Bear Cat Mining Company, held a lease dated April 29, 1913, for a mining property in Jasper county, Missouri, including the machinery for the operation of the mine. The lease ran for a term of ten years, with a royalty of 10 per cent of the value of all ore sold. On July 18, 1913, the plaintiff subleased the same property to the defendant, Grasselli Chemical Company, for similar purposes, for a term ending April 29, 1923. It was agreed in the lease that, if the defendant should at any time fail or refuse to keep any stipulation on its part, plaintiff might, at its option, terminate the lease, and retake possession of the property, giving the defendant ten days' written notice thereof. The royalty was fixed at 15 per cent. The lease further provided that defendant "shall also have the right and privilege of terminating this lease at any time upon giving said first party thirty days' notice in writing of its intention to terminate this lease at least thirty days after the delivery to said first party of such written notice." Defendant operated the mine until September 29, 1913, when it mailed a notice of its intention to terminate the lease to the plaintiff. The evidence is reasonably satisfactory that this notice was received. At the same time the defendant notified plaintiff that it would suspend operating the pumps. The mine was one which required the operation of the pumps constantly to prevent flooding. In the notice defendant also notified plaintiff that he could take possession of the property at any time, and operate the same, and do whatever was necessary for its protection. Defendant left the mine on October 4, 1913. Neither he nor the plaintiff did anything by its operation to protect it during the month of October, and at the end of the month the owner of the mine declared a forfeiture of his lease with plaintiff, and went into possession of the property.

The present action is brought by the plaintiff to recover $50,000 damages (the alleged value of plaintiff's lease), for defendant's failure to comply with the terms of his sublease, and the breach relied upon is his abandonment of the property during the thirty days covered by the notice, thus giving a right to the owner of the property to forfeit plaintiff's lease. The court directed a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1 damages only, upon the ground that it was the duty of the plaintiff himself, upon receiving the notice that was given him, and the right, to retake possession of the property and safeguard his own leasehold interests, to do whatever was necessary to that end, for the purpose of mitigating his damages; that he could not stand by and permit his lease to be forfeited, and then seek to recover full damages therefor.

This decision was clearly right. The rule of law applicable to the case was never better stated than by Judge Selden in Hamilton v. McPherson, 28 N. Y. 72, 76, 84 Am. Dec. 330: "The law, for wise reasons, imposes upon a party subjected to injury from a breach of contract the active duty of making reasonable exertions to render the injury as light as possible. Public interest and sound morality accord with the law in demanding this; and if the injured party, through negligence or wilfulness, allows the damages to be unnecessarily enhanced, the increased loss justly falls upon him."

Mr. Benjamin, in his work on Sales, 4th Am. ed. page 1327, says that a man thus situated must do all that "a reasonable man of business" would have done under the same circumstances to prevent the damages from being enhanced. Sedgwick on Damages, 9th ed. § 205, says: "Where damages are claimed, not for the direct injury, that is, the loss of the value of the contract itself, but for consequential loss, the plaintiff cannot recover for such loss if he might reasonably have avoided it," and cites a multitude of cases, English and American, to support this rule.

The damages here which the plaintiff sought to recover were clearly "consequential," as that term is employed by Mr. Sedgwick. If the plaintiff had gone into possession of the mine, and worked it during the period of thirty days, he could have recovered as damages all the loss which he suffered by that operation. Such damages would have been the direct result of the defendant's violation of the contract. But the damages which the plaintiff is in fact seeking to recover are not the direct result of defendant's violation of the sublease, but are more properly referable to plaintiff's violation of his own lease with the owner of the mine. In the leading case in the Supreme Court, Warren v. Stoddart, 105 U. S. 224, 26 L. ed. 1117, the rule is stated as follows: "Where a party is entitled to the benefit of a contract and can save himself from a loss arising from a breach of it at a trifling expense or with reasonable exertions, it is his duty to do it, and he can charge the delinquent with such damages only as, with reasonable endeavors and expense, he could not prevent."

The word "trifling" in this passage has reference to the situation of the parties. It means a sum which is trifling in comparison with the consequential damages which the plaintiff is seeking to recover in the particular case. The rule which we have stated will be found further illustrated in the following cases: Ramsey v. Perth Amboy Shipbuilding & Engineering Co. 72 N. J. Eq. 165, 65 Atl. 461; Atkinson v. Kirkpatrick, 90 Kan. 515, 135 Pac. 579; Mabb v. Stewart, 147 Cal. 413, 81 Pac. 1073; Oxford Knitting Mills v. American Wringer Co. 6 Ga. App. 642, 65 S. E. 791; Kimball Bros. Co. v. Citizens' Gas & E. Co. 141 Iowa, 632, 118 N. W. 891; Sherman Center Town Co. v. Leonard, 46 Kan. 354, 26 Am. St. Rep. 101, 26 Pac. 717.

The judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Duty of party to lease to minimize damages due to a breach of contract by other party thereto.

It is not intended to include herein cases involving the question as to the duty of the tenant to make repairs where the landlord fails to comply with his covenant in this regard.

The general rule applicable to damages for breach of contract, that it is the duty of the injured party to exercise ordinary care to minimize his damages; applies to leases, and it is the duty of the party to a lease, injured by a breach thereof by the other party thereto, to exercise reasonable diligence and due care to prevent or minimize, as far as he can, the injury or loss due to the breach. This doctrine is applied to landlords in BEAR CAT MIN. CO. v. GRASSELLI CHEMICAL CO. ante, 907.

Where the lessee abandons the premises before the expiration of the lease, it is the duty of the lessor to exercise due diligence to re-rent the premises and thereby diminish the damages. Sears v. Curtis (1914) 189 Ill. App. 420.

As to the duty of the lessee where the lessor breaches his lease, see Moses v. Autuono (1908) 56 Fla. 499, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, 47 So. 925, stating the rule that if the lessee, by reasonable exertion or care, can prevent damages resulting to him by reason of the landlord's breach of contract to lease, it is his duty to do so. So far as he could have prevented loss to himself, he cannot recover damages therefor.

The lessee in a lease containing a covenant to repair is under the duty of using ordinary care and diligence to lighten the consequential damages resulting therefrom. Brunswick Grocery Co. v. Spencer (1895) 97 Ga. 764, 25 S. E. 764. To the same effect where the statute requires the landlord to repair is Ball v. Walsh (1912) 137 Ga. 350, 73 S. E. 585; Aikin v. Perry (1903) 119 Ga. 263, 46 S. E. 93.

See upon this point, Roberts v. Lehl (1915) 27 Colo. App. 351, 149 Pac. 851, holding that where the landlord breached his covenant to furnish water to irrigate the leased premises, if the tenant, by the expenditure of a few dollars and the payment of a water tax, might have secured the necessary water for irrigation, he cannot recover damages for the loss of the crop, due to the failure to secure water.

The rule has been applied to tenants frequently in cases of injury to the tenant's property from the elements or defective water pipes. For example, it has been held that a tenant whose landlord has agreed to put the premises in repair, but has failed to do so, the tenant knowing that his property will be exposed to injury from storms or otherwise endangered if left upon the premises, has no right to take the hazard, and if he does and his property is injured, he cannot recover from the landlord therefor. Hendry v. Squier (1890) 126 Ind. 19, 9 L.R.A. 798, 25 N. E. 830; Cook v. Soule (1874) 56 N. Y. 420, affirming (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 116 (leaky roof); Rose v. Butler (1893) 69 Hun, 140, 23 N. Y. Supp. 375; Reiner v. Jones (1899) 38 App. Div. 441, 56 N. Y. Supp. 423; Klausner v. Harter (1901) 36 Misc. 869, 74 N. Y. Supp. 924; Margolius v. Muldberg (1904) 88 N. Y. Supp. 1048; Weinberg v. Ely (1906) 114 App. Div. 857, 100 N. Y. Supp. 283.

So, where the roof is injured by fire, it is the tenant's duty to exercise ordinary care to protect his goods kept therein from injury by the elements, and if he fails in this regard he cannot hold the lessor liable for a consequent injury to his goods, although the lessor told him it was not necessary for him to move on account of the fire. Gavan v. Norcross (1903) 117 Ga. 356, 43 S. E. 771, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 495.

Where the lessee had reasonable opportunity to place his goods under shelter before it rained, he cannot recover from the lessor damages due to injury by the elements, although the goods were exposed by the wrongful act of the lessor in moving them from a building on the leased premises. Mershon v. Williams (1899) 62 N. J. L. 779, 42 Atl. 778.

And even though the lessor wrongfully destroyed a building upon the leased premises and left the lessee's goods exposed to the elements, the latter cannot wilfully and negligently leave them to be destroyed, and hold the lessor for their value; and if the conduct of the lessor prevents the lessee from making further use of the building in his business, it is his duty to use reasonable efforts to secure at a reasonable expense another building equally as good, in which to continue his business. Hahn v. Mackay (1912) 63 Or. 100, 126 Pac. 12, rehearing denied in (1912) 63 Or. 111, 126 Pac. 991.

It is the duty of the tenant to minimize injury to his goods, due to the failure of the landlord to repair defective water pipes. Atkinson v. Kirkpatrick (1913) 90 Kan. 515, 135 Pac. 579; Huber v. Ryan (1901) 57 App. Div. 34, 67 N. Y. Supp. 972.

The rule holding that the lessee must use reasonable care to minimize damages has been held to apply only where he was in possession of the premises and had a right to make the repairs himself, and was in a position to inform himself by investigation as to whether or not repairs had been made by the lessor; and the rule has been held not to apply where the lessee was a tenant of only a portion of the premises, and the lessor retained possession of the roof, which was defective, for in such case the lessee had no right to go upon it to ascertain whether or not the lessor had fulfilled his promise to repair it. Phillips v. Ehrmann (1894) 8 Misc. 39, 28 N. Y. Supp. 519.

And the lessee is not guilty of contributory negligence in not protecting his goods from injury by rain over Sunday, although he knew the lessor was repairing the roof and that it would not shed water, since he had the right to rely upon the lessor or the latter's contractor making repairs, to protect the roof. Blumenthal v. Prescott (1902) 70 App. Div. 560, 75 N. Y. Supp. 710.

Although recognizing the general rule, it has been held that where the lessor undertook to repair the roof so as to make it rain proof, even though the lessee did not remove his goods, but permitted them to remain exposed to injury by storms, and to damage from the damp condition of the building, due to the defects in the roof, it was nevertheless a question of fact for the jury as to whether or not the lessee exercised ordinary care in protecting his goods, and a verdict in his favor upon this point will not be disturbed. Sanger v. Smith (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 135 S. W. 189. A. G. S.

Witness — transaction with person

The next of kin of a woman who contracted to perform services for a person since deceased cannot, in an action to recover upon the contract after the death of her ancestor, which is defended by deceased's executor, testify that her ancestor was under obligation to care for decedent, and performed services under such obligation, and that decedent promised compensation, under a statute forbidding testimony as to transactions with deceased in an action against his executor or administrator, since the interest of the next of kin is the same as that of the ancestor.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for Pitt County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the value of services alleged to be due under a contract to care for defendant's decedent. New trial.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Harding & Pierce and W. F. Evans, for appellant:

Testimony of the plaintiff administratrix concerning communications and transactions between her decedent and the decedent of the defendant executrix was inadmissible.

Grissom v. Grissom, 170 N. C. 97, 86 S. E. 996; Harrell v. Hagan, 150 N. C. 242, 63 S. E. 952; Witty v. Barham, 147 N. C. 479, 61 S. E. 273; Wilson v. Featherston, 122 N. C. 749, 30 S. E. 325.

Testimony concerning the value of the alleged services is incompetent.

Stocks v. Cannon, 139 N. E. 60, 51 S. E. 802.

Messrs. Albion Dunn and M. K. Blount for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was brought for the purpose of recovering the value of services performed in taking care of the defendant, J. E. S. Adams, in his old age, and while he was feeble and infirm, upon the promise made by him at the time that he would leave to plaintiff's intestate, Denie T. Brown, and her children, plaintiff herself being one of them, all of his property, both real and personal, worth about $20,000. Plaintiff sued as administratrix of her mother, and in her own behalf, to recover whatever amount is due, on account of the services rendered by them under the contract, and in order to establish her case she was permitted to testify, as a witness in her own behalf, to divers transactions and communications between her intestate and the defendant, since deceased.

When this case was argued before us, we received the impression that the defendant had "first opened the door" in regard to the testimony of transactions and communications between the plaintiff's mother, Mrs. Denie T. Brown, and the original defendant, J. E. S. Adams. We find, upon further investigation, that such was not the case; but on the contrary, that the plaintiff offered this testimony at the outset of the trial before the jury. It will suffice to state generally that the testimony of the plaintiff herself related mostly to transactions and communications between her mother and intestate, Denie T. Brown, and the original defendant, J. E. S. Adams, who has since died. The defendant Mary Adams, his sister, is his executrix, and as such has been made a party to this action, in his place, as defendant. The plaintiff, a witness for herself individually and as administratrix, was permitted, under the examination of her counsel, to state very fully conversations and dealings between her mother and the defendant's testator, which, she alleged, occurred in her presence. That she is a deeply interested party, and has a large interest in the result of this action, not the slightest doubt can be entertained. There was also testimony of the plaintiff which was admitted over objection by defendant, and which related directly to a transaction or communication between the plaintiff herself and Mr. Adams. After giving a summary of the "actings and doings" of her mother and herself, on the one side, and Mr. Adams and his sister Mary, in 1912, when the latter moved to Greenville for the purpose of taking up their residence with them, where they were to receive the care and attention described by her, certain questions were propounded to her, which, with the answers thereto, are as follows:

Question 1: "State whether you or your mother were under obligations to care for or attend to the wants and necessities of Mr. Adams." Answer: "Yes, sir; we were under obligations to take care and attend to him and help them in sickness and in health."

Question 2: "State if you heard any conversation between Mr. Stanley Adams and your mother with reference to any consideration which he agreed to pay her in consequence of her waiting on and taking care of him." Answer: "Yes; he did say that he would make to her all his property."

Question 3: "Just state any conversation you may have heard between Mr. Adams and your mother relating to any compensation your mother was to receive."

Answer: "He said he would give her the house and lot they now live in and give her a deed of gift for it to take place at his death; that pending the suit with Colin Tucker he said it would not be any good to make anything then until that was settled, and then he would make a will to her, including that and everything else; that the conversation took place in our home."

Witness further stated that they moved there then, and that his physical condition was bad, not being able to sit up. That Miss Mary's health was also bad.

Question 4: "Describe what attention and care, if any, your mother devoted to the comfort of Mr. Adams and Miss Mary."

Answer: "She cooked for them, nursed them and sat up with them, read for them, and did everything that she could think of that would comfort him."

Question 5: "In consequence of that conversation, tell us what your mother did from 1912, when you say Mr. Adams and Miss Mary moved to Greenville." Answer: "In February, 1912, they moved in our home on Church street; mama had attended to that; and they moved to our home and stayed there with us until some time in April; and during that time my mother cooked for them, carried meals to them, and made extra nourishment for them; and it was necessary to rub him with liniment, and that was done. In April they moved from mama's house to an adjoining house, and we moved with them; after we moved with them mama cooked for them and did as I have said. Mr. Adams's condition was such as to require a physician several times."

Question 6: "From your knowledge of what your mother did,—the attentions paid to the old people that you have testified about,—what, in your opinion, would be a reasonable compensation for her services?"

Answer: "Three thousand dollars. I did not know about Mr. Adams leaving a will when he died; my mother was not paid anything for the services rendered."

Question 7: "How long did the care and attention your mother gave Mr. Adams and Miss Adams last? Answer: "Up until the day she was taken sick, eight days before she died."

Other interested witnesses were allowed to be asked, and to answer, similar questions. These questions and answers were each duly objected to by the defendant, and the several objections were overruled. Defendant excepted, and from the verdict and judgment in favor of the plaintiff, she appealed to this court, and here insists that the evidence was incompetent under Revisal, § 1631, and we agree with her that there was evidence which should have been excluded. Her counsel asked the witness, and she was permitted to answer, the first of the questions, which for convenience we have numbered. This answer clearly involved a personal transaction or communication between the plaintiff and Mr. Adams, who at the time of the trial was dead; the interests of those to whom his estate belongs under his will being defended by his executrix. This testimony should have been excluded, as its admission is expressly forbidden by the Revisal, § 1631, and this error, and the erroneous admission of other like testimony, entitles the defendant to a new trial.

But if the other testimony of the plaintiff, in regard to the transactions between her mother and Mr. Adams, is to be considered, we are of opinion that it was likewise incompetent under the same section. The plaintiff relies upon Ballard v. Ballard, 75 N. C. 191; Loftin v. Loftin, 96 N. C. 99, 1 S. E. 837; McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 600, 8 S. E. 225; Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043; Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 244, 48 S. E. 640. We will now consider these cases, and show that not one of them applies, but that each and all of them dealt with questions which are radically different. Ballard v. Ballard, supra, was one of the "proof of handwriting" cases, like State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, 64 N. C. 313, which, as Justice Bynum stated, do not involve any personal transaction or communication, but may be based on knowledge acquired in quite a different way. Referring to State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, supra, in Ballard v. Ballard, supra, he said: "In State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, supra, it was held that although it was competent for the plaintiff to prove the handwriting of the intestate of the defendant, it was incompetent for him to prove that he saw the intestate actually sign a particular paper. The distinction is that handwriting is proved by a general knowledge of it, and the proof is abstract, and as applicable to one case as another. But proof by him that he saw the deceased sign a particular paper is proof of a transaction between him and the deceased. In our case Wooten, the assignee, it is true, was not called to prove directly the assignment to him by the intestate, but he was called to prove, and did prove, that he saw J. Gooding 'sign his name as witness to the indorsement of the intestate, Council Gooding.' The signature of the intestate was a cross mark, incapable of identification and proof, without an attesting witness, whereupon the defendant Gooding was called in by the parties as this witness to the ceremony of transferring the bond from the intestate of Wooten. And now Wooten, a party to that 'transaction,' is called to prove, and under objection does prove, all the facts necessary to make effectual this transaction between him and the intestate; to wit, that he saw the defendant sign his name as a witness. He thus indirectly, but conclusively, testifies to a transaction between himself and a person since deceased. The case falls directly within the principle established in State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, above cited, and Whitesides v. Green, 64 N. C. 307; Murphy v. Ray, 73 N. C. 588; McCanless v. Reynolds, 74 N. C. 301. The witness Wooten, having indorsed the bond to the plaintiff with a guaranty, the result of this action, of course, can affect his interest or the interest previously owned by him. Code Civ. Proc. § 343. We are not disposed to relax the common-law rules of evidence beyond the innovations clearly established by the recent legislature."

We have quoted Justice Bynum's language somewhat at length, because it is very significant in this connection, and surely indicates with striking emphasis that an interested witness will not be allowed to testify indirectly to a transaction or communication with a deceased party which will affect his interest favorably in the event of the action, no more than he will be permitted to do so directly, provided his interest is adverse to that of such deceased party. Equally unfortunate to the plaintiff are the other citations. Loftin v. Loftin, supra, had nothing to do with a transaction or communication between the plaintiff, Mrs. Loftin, and the deceased party, to wit, her father, but it was between her and a third party. Justice Davis said: "It was a substantive transaction, with no one now deceased, under whom she, or any of the parties to this action, derived any interest. It was a transaction with Wm. Gooding alone. Loftin was not present, and the case of Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, and Ballard v. Ballard, 75 N. C. 190, relied on by counsel for the defendant, are distinguishable from this, in that in Halyburton v. Dobson, the communication, though not between the witness and Harshaw, the deceased testator, yet it was between Harshaw and Pearson (both of whom were dead), about the matter in dispute, and the witness and Harshaw had, by agreement, gone to Pearson to advise with him about it, so in fact the witness was the party really interested in the conversation between Harshaw and Pearson, and though the conversation was carried on by Harshaw and Pearson, the witness was present, and in fact a party to it, as it related to advice given by Pearson, upon which they were to act."

That case also favors the defendant's position, for there it is virtually said that the presence of the witness, when the transaction or communication is had between the deceased and another party, is sufficient to disqualify him, especially when he has an interest in the event. It should be noted here that the plaintiff in this case, who testified, had a direct and important interest, besides being a party to the action, and that her mother was also interested, so that the heirs and distributees of Mr. Adams, who are represented by the defendant, his executrix, have no one to testify in rebuttal of plaintiff's testimony. Said Chief Justice Pearson, in McCanless v. Reynolds, 74 N. C. 314: "Allowing a party to an action to give evidence in his own behalf is a wide departure from the rules of evidence at common law, and the proviso in § 343, which fixes a limit to this departure, should be construed liberally. The effect of it is to exclude one of the parties to a transaction, who is afterwards a party to an action, concerning the right or property involved in the transaction from the enabling clause of the statute, in the event of the death of the other party to the transaction. The proviso rests on the ground, not merely that the dead man cannot have a fair showing, but upon the broader and more practical ground that the other party to the action has no chance, even by the oath of a relevant witness, to reply to the oath of the party to the action, if he be allowed to testify. The principle is, unless both parties to a transaction can be heard on oath, a party to an action is not a competent witness in regard to the transaction."

Could words be devised which more strongly condemn testimony of the kind here offered by the plaintiff, both upon principle and a sound construction of the statute? It shocks our ideas of fair play thus to place one of the parties at the mercy of the other, by allowing one to speak in his own behalf, when he is under the power and influence of self-interest, by silencing the other so that he cannot reply. This is an unjust advantage not contemplated by the statute.

But, continuing our examination of plaintiff's authorities, McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 598, 8 S. E. 225, only held that the evidence did not relate to a transaction or communication between the witness and a deceased person, under which the defendant claimed, but only to what she saw in her husband's hands. He was the only party concerned, and had no transaction or communication with anyone. The case did not come within the terms of the statute, nor within its letter or spirit. There were no dealings between a party deceased and another person, which was witnessed by a third and interested person, who was the witness, as in our case. We may add that we do not see how the testimony in the McCall Case was material or harmful to defendants. Their contention was that the deed from John E. Moore to Joseph McCall was void as against the deed from Moore's administrator to assignors of defendants, for want of registration. Justice Davis says that was the only ground relied upon in the case.

Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043, involves no such question as we have here. The plaintiff and her mother, the witness, were each entitled to half of the crop of plaintiff's father, the witness's husband, by separate and distinct rights. The witness claimed as his widow, and the plaintiff under a trust created by her grandfather, and it was proposed to prove by the writing the admissions of the deceased as to the trust. This was clearly competent, for there was no transaction or communication in which the witness could be interested, and the witness, therefore, had no interest in the event of the action, and she was not a party thereto. That case is valuable for its fine analysis of the statute into proper subdivisions by the present Chief Justice, which relieves it of much obscurity. But its facts do not bear any resemblance to our case. The Chief Justice makes this appear, when he pointedly says: "She is not: (1) A party to the suit; nor (2) is she shown to be interested in the event of the action; nor (3) does any person belonging to the above two classes claim title under or through her. That she had a claim to the other part of the crop of her husband than that, the proceeds of which the plaintiff claims the deceased held in trust for her, does not disqualify" (citing Mull v. Martin, 85 N. C. 406).

We do not see what application Lane v. Rogers, 113 N. C. 171, 18 S. E. 117, can possibly have to this case. The court held there that the testimony was incompetent, but did say that the witness could have testified that she saw the intestate have the book on the day of her marriage, as this was no transaction or communication. The point was not in the case, and we merely repeat what was said therein to show that there was nothing in the statute that applied to those facts. It was like knowing a man's handwriting because the witness had often seen it. Besides, the witness had no interest in the result of the action, so far as appeared, and if she had, her evidence was against that interest, as she was testifying against the defendants, to whom she had conveyed her dower. So that case is not applicable. Here the witness testified to a transaction and communication between her mother and Mr. Adams, defendant's testator, while in that case, the witness testified "abstractly" concerning a single individual fact which came within her vision. The court said in the Ballard Case, supra, if the witness had said, "I saw him sign the paper," or, in the Lane Case, "I saw him pay for the deed and get it," it would be different and come within the statute as a transaction or communication. It will be found that all the cases cited by the plaintiff have this special feature of single action, and not joint action by the testator and another, and of a thing accomplished, and not one going on to completion; but more of this hereafter.

Judge Reade, in Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, stated this question as a grave one, likely to arise in the future, and strongly intimated against the competency of the evidence under our statute.

The cases of Carroll v. Smith, 163 N. C. 204, 79 S. E. 497, and Zollicoffer v. Zollicoffer, 168 N. C. 326, 84 S. E. 349, do not, in the least, conflict with our views. In the first of these cases, Justice Allen said: "The evidence of the widow was objected to under § 1631 of the Revisal, but she did not testify to a communication or transaction with the deceased (Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 243, 48 S. E. 640), nor was her evidence against the personal representative of the deceased, or against anyone claiming under the deceased (Bunn v. Todd, 107 N. C. 267, 11 S. E. 1043). She simply told what she saw, and against one claiming under Henry Carroll, and not under Albert Carroll."

In the second of the cases, the alleged transaction or communication was substantially admitted in the pleadings, and the witness, as in several of the cases already cited by us, "told only what he saw," viz., an indorsement on the paper signed by Mrs. Thomas, which was placed by her in the Bible. When the cases upon this subject are properly classified, they are easily reconciled.

There are several decisions by this court, of comparatively recent date, which decide this very question against the competency of such evidence as was admitted in this case. It was held in Wilson v. Featherston, 122 N. C. 749, 30 S. E. 325, and the court squarely decided this point as indicated by us. The question there was: "Defendant, Clara, testifying, was asked by her counsel: 'State whether or not you heard a conversation between your father and J. E. L.R.A.1918C.

Rankin at the Battery Park Bank in July, 1893, in regard to his bank deposit, and what disposition he had made of it?"

The question was excluded, and this court affirmed the ruling unanimously, the Chief Justice saying: "One purpose of § 590 was to disqualify an interested party to testify to a conversation or transaction between the deceased and the witness, because there is no one to contradict the witness, and we think a true construction of that much-construed section excludes the evidence of a third party to such conversation, if the third party is interested in the result of the action, and there is no one to contradict the statement of the witness. Here, Wilson is dead, Rankin is a party and incompetent, and the witness Clara is a defendant, and claims the property through a gift of her deceased father. So she is interested, and there is no one else who can speak of the transaction or contradict the witness. In Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, this court recognized the gravity of the question, but left it for future consideration.' In a later case the plaintiff's testator was a trustee of the slave in question for one Lloyd. In the course of the trial Lloyd was offered to prove a conversation between the plaintiff's testator (trustee of the witness) and the defendant's intestate. The court excluded Lloyd's evidence, as he was practically the plaintiff in the action. Barlow v. Norfleet, 72 N. C. 535."

The same was the decision in Witty v. Barham, 147 N. C. 479, 61 S. E. 372, upon similar facts, and the identical question is precisely stated and tersely, but unquestionably, decided, the present Chief Justice writing the opinion: "The court also properly excluded the testimony of one of the defendants offered to prove that she heard the aforesaid conversation between her mother and said Charles G. Daniel, as that would be the 'indirect testimony of an interested witness as to a transaction or communication with the deceased.' Stocks v. Cannon, 139 N. C. 60, 51 S. E. 802."

Such witness would have been competent to testify to "any substantive and independent fact" that is not "a communication or personal transaction" with the deceased, as, in Gray v. Cooper, 65 N. C. 183, that the deceased had possession and use of the slaves, or March v. Verble, 79 N. C. 19, that the deceased had owned but one bull since the war, and his value, and the numerous cases which held that an interested witness can prove the handwriting of the deceased, "but not that she saw him sign the paper sued on" (citing Davidson v. Bardin, 139 N. C. 2, 51 S. E. 779). We could not state the point more clearly, or by language set at rest more definitely, securely, and permanently any controversy as to the incompetency of this testimony. It has the great merit of being the final word, strongly and unanswerably expressed upon a matter where there had been almost, but not entire, uniformity of decision, and must be so considered. But it has since been approved and adopted, without any question, by a unanimous court as decisive of the question, as closing the controversy, and as forever shutting the door against further discussion. To reopen it now would be regrettable and positively unwise, in view of the direct, consistent, and final opinions of this court so frequently expressed. We will show later that it is the just and correct decision, and the proper and intended construction of the statute. We refer to Harrell v. Hagan, 150 N. C. 242, 63 S. E. 952, and Grissom v. Grissom, 170 N. C. 97, 86 S. E. 996 (opinion by Justice Brown), where Witty v. Barham, supra, was expressly approved, without any further discussion, as the settled law upon this subject. In Grissom v. Grissom, 170 N. C. at page 99, Justice Brown says, quoting from Harrell v. Hagan, supra: "Whether the construction by the court of Revisal, § 1631, is the correct one, it is useless for us now to discuss. The true meaning of the statute and of the intent of the legislature have been settled by this court in well-considered opinions, which we are not disposed to disturb."

He also cites Wilson v. Featherston and Witty v. Barham, supra, as finally settling the law. All of these cases were decided with the concurrence of all the members of the court. If there has been any contrary expression of opinion by us, in the less recent past, it has been superseded in our later decisions with unanimous approval. Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 243, 48 S. E. 640, was correctly decided on other grounds, as I thought then, and therefore concurred in the result. My opinion is the same now.

The decisions in other jurisdictions are equally emphatic in the rejection of such evidence, the statutes being the same as ours, relating to personal transactions or communications. Justice Brewer, afterwards a member of the highest Federal court for many years, and an eminent jurist, as shown by his long judicial career and his valuable services, said in Wills v. Wood, 28 Kan. at page 408, discussing a question similar to ours: "Mrs. Forbes, as well as Mrs. Maples, was plaintiff, each claiming as heir of Willis Wills, and each seeking to recover from the administratrix and heirs of David E. James. Neither could testify under the statute as to any transaction or communication had personally with David E. James. Can it be possible that, when the two are present with James and a conversation is carried on, that while neither could testify as to what James said to herself personally, she could testify as to what he said to the other? We think not. Such a ruling would be forbidden by the spirit, at least, of the statute. That statute plainly contemplates preventing one party from introducing in evidence conversations had with the ancestor of the adverse party, and this because the lips of such ancestor, closed by death, cannot be heard to give his version of the conversation; and where there are two persons on the one side, having like interests, they should, for the purpose of giving force to the statute, be considered as one, and neither be permitted to give her version of the conversations and statements of the deceased to the other in her presence. Counsel for defendants in their brief well expose the injustice of the ruling asked by plaintiff when they say: 'For instance, James might have conversed with the mother for five minutes about the bond, in the presence and hearing of the daughter, and then turned around and conversed with the daughter upon the same subject, in the presence and hearing of the mother, and while neither would be allowed to testify as to the conversation had with herself, either could testify as to the conversation heard by her between James and the other.' The ruling of the district court was correct."

And so in Dawson v. Waggaman, 23 App. D. C. 428, it was said, at page 434: "With reference to the second question, that is, whether the testimony of one of the defendants, Julia Dawson, was admissible to prove conversations between the deceased and the defendant Charles E. Dawson, it is sufficient to say that § 1064 of the Code is too plain and explicit to allow of any controversy in this regard. The provision is a just one, and the testimony was properly excluded."

It was held in Parks v. Caudle, 58 Tex. 216, that "a party to a suit against heirs claiming the property through their deceased ancestor is precluded under article 2248, Rev. Stat., not only from testifying to statements made to him by the deceased, and to transactions between the deceased and himself, but also as to any such statements to or transactions between deceased and third persons; and this although occurring at a time when the witness had no interest in such statements or transactions."

In Comstock v. Comstock, 76 Minn. 396, 79 N. W. 300, it was held: "A party to an action, or interested in the result thereof, cannot give evidence as to conversations with a deceased person, even though the witness took no part in the conversation."

In Tison v. Gass, 46 Tex. Civ. App. 163, 102 S. W. 752, it was proposed by the plaintiff, heir of the deceased wife, to give evidence of a conversation between the wife and her husband, tending to show that the husband bought the property in dispute with money received from a sale of his wife's separate property, and the evidence was excluded as incompetent under their statute as to transactions, etc., of a deceased. But Matthews v. Hoagland, 48 N. J. Eq. 455, 21 Atl. 1054, is like our case exactly in its facts. There it was held: "A party to a suit is not a competent witness, under the act of 1880, to testify adversely to another party suing in a representative capacity, as to a transaction of the deceased with a person other than the witness, in which the witness and such person are interested, although such interests are divisible."

Other cases to the same effect are Holland v. Holland, 98 App. Div. 366, 90 N. Y. Supp. 208; Pederson v. Christofferson, 97 Minn. 491, 106 N. W. 958. In Erwin v. Erwin, 54 Hun, 166, 7 N. Y. Supp. 365, it appeared that a father told his son, in the presence and hearing of the latter's wife, that he gave him a certain tract of land, and the son assented to the gift. The wife said nothing. In an action against the deceased father's grantee to enforce performance of the contract, it was held the wife was an incompetent witness to prove the contract, being virtually a party to the transaction.

The testimony of an interested witness, especially one who will be as greatly benefited by a recovery as the plaintiff in this case, concerning a transaction between the deceased and another interested party, would be practically the same as the latter's testimony as to the same transaction, with no opportunity to contradict it; and, even if the person who had the transaction or communication were living, the representative of the deceased would be handicapped by the fact of her interest in the event of the action, making her a hostile witness. The mere presence of the witness made her practically a party to the transaction or communication, and, though passively so, yet with the same effect as if she had really and personally taken an active part in it. Roberts v. Remy, 56 Ohio St. 255, 46 N. E. 1066. A recovery in this case will inure almost directly to the plaintiff as next of kin to her mother.

We might cite many other cases to the same effect as those above named, but it is unnecessary to do so, as those already cited are quite sufficient to show the strong leaning of judicial opinion against the admissibility of this kind of testimony. All of the statutes on the subject, in the states upon which we have drawn for authorities in support of this view of the law, are substantially like ours, and some literally so.

We do not think that there is any force at all in the objection of plaintiff to the form of the exceptions and assignments of error based upon them. They squarely raise the question we have discussed. It was not necessary to except to the answers separately, as they were directly responsive to the questions, to which the exceptions were properly taken.

There was error, we think, in the rulings of the court upon the objections to evidence, which entitle the defendant to a new trial of the issues.

Clark, Ch. J., dissenting:

This action is brought by the plaintiff, as administratrix of her mother, Denie T. Brown, and by herself individually, for services rendered decedent, J. E. S. Adams, who has died since this action was begun, and his executrix, Mary Adams, is substituted as party defendant.

The evidence of the plaintiff was that J. E. S. Adams was an old man and in poor health, living with his sister (now his executrix), who was also old, and in bad health; that said Adams made a bargain with the plaintiff's mother that if they would live with them and take care of him and his sister, he would leave to Denie Brown, his property, at his death. There was evidence that he made such will, but that after the death of Denie Brown he tore up said will, and this action is brought to recover value of the services rendered under said contract by plaintiff and her mother.

The first seven exceptions are to the admission of the testimony of the plaintiff, Maggie Brown, who testified as to the conversation between her mother and J. E. S. Adams in making the contract. The defendant contends that this evidence is incompetent under § 1631 of the Revisal, because the plaintiff is interested as a party to the action, and is testifying against the estate of one now deceased. The conversation, however, was not between the plaintiff witness and the decedent (the testator of the defendant), and the evidence was therefore competent. In Ballard v. Ballard, 75 N. C. 191, Bynum, J., says, in his clear-cut style: It is not by being a party to the action, or interested in the event, that one becomes disqualified, for notwithstanding that fact he is competent "except . . . as to any transaction or communication between such witness and the person . . . deceased."

This section is analyzed in Bunn v. Todd,

107 N. C. 266, 11 S. E. 1043, where it is held that a person who is interested or a party is competent to testify against the estate of a person deceased when the conversation or transaction is not between the witness and the deceased, but between the deceased and another party. The principle of the code system is the general competency of testimony, though the witness is a party, or interested in the event of the action, leaving its credibility to the jury, the only exception being where the witness is not only a party to the action or interested in its event, and is testifying in his own interest and against the interest of the person deceased, but, further, the testimony must be in regard to the transaction or communication between the witness and the person since deceased; otherwise the testimony is competent. The provision being statutory, the court must observe it, and cannot exclude evidence except when authorized by its terms.

In Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 244, 48 S. E. 640, the exact point was discussed and decided, the court saying: "The Code, § 590 [now Revisal, § 1631], disqualifies a party to an action, or one interested in the event thereof, from testifying in his . . . interest against the person claiming adversely as to 'a personal transaction or communication between the witness and the deceased person or lunatic,' except when the executor of such opposing party or the testimony of the deceased person or lunatic is given in evidence concerning the same transaction or communication. But here the witness testified as to no transaction or communication between herself and W. M. Cameron. It was a transaction between W. M. Cameron and her husband, and as to that she was a competent witness notwithstanding her interest. State ex rel. Dobbins v. Osborne, 67 N. C. 259; McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 600, 8 S. E. 225; and Loftin v. Loftin, 96 N. C. 99, 1 S. E. 837, are in point, as also Ballard v. Ballard, 75 N. C. 191 [quoting Bynum, J., ut supra]," and citing further State ex rel. Peoples v. Maxwell, 64 N. C. 313 (where such witness was held competent to prove the handwriting of the deceased); Bright v. Marcom, 121 N. C. 86, 28 S. E. 60 (where an interested witness was allowed to prove the delivery of a deed between the deceased and another); Lane v. Rogers, 113 N. C. 171, 18 S. E. 117.

In Halyburton v. Dobson, 65 N. C. 88, relied upon by the defendant, the point was not decided. Johnson v. Cameron, supra, has been cited since with approval by Allen, J., in Carroll v. Smith, 163 N. C. 205, 79 S. E. 497, and by Walker, J., in Zollicoffer v. Zollicoffer, 168 N. C. 329, 84 S. E. 349, who cited also the other cases above quoted. In Wilson v. Featherston, 122 N. C. 749, 30 S. E. 325, prior to Johnson v. Cameron, Faircloth, Ch. J., seems to take a different view. But the statute is so plain that we cannot disregard it, and must hold that case an inadvertence, which we cannot approve.

While there has been some conflict in the past in our decisions on this point, it has been settled in accordance with the decision in Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 243, 48 S. E. 640, by the last two opinions in this court, which have cited it with approval. In Carroll v. Smith, 163 N. C. 205, 79 S. E. 497, Allen, J., says: "The evidence of the widow was objected to under § 1631 of the Revisal, but she did not testify to a communication of the transaction with the deceased (Johnson v. Cameron, 136 N. C. 243, 48 S. E. 640)."

In Zollicoffer v. Zollicoffer, 168 N. C. 329, 84 S. E. 351, Walker, J., says: "As to the question of evidence, we think the court confined the testimony of plaintiff, D. B. Zollicoffer, to what occurred between Mrs. Thomas and the defendant E. T. Zollicoffer, and in this view there could be no valid objection to it, as the witness was not speaking of any communication or transaction between him and Mrs. Thomas, but of one between her and a third party. Johnson v. Cameron and Bunn v. Todd, supra; Dobbins v. Osborne, 67 N. C. 259; McCall v. Wilson, 101 N. C. 600, 8 S. E. 225; Loftin v. Loftin, 96 N. C. 99, 1 S. E. 837; Ballard v. Ballard, supra."

Besides, Johnson v. Cameron, thus approved to date, is in conformity with the exact language of Revisal, § 1631 (Bunn v. Todd, supra), and the statute should have precedence over any conflicting decisions.

Annotation—Right of surviving spouse, heir, or next of kin to testify in favor of the estate.

Upon the question as to whether or not a statutory rule excluding testimony of transaction with a deceased person by party or person in interest may be invoked against the estate of the decedent or person claiming under the estate, see note appended to Bailey v. Robison, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 305.

As to the competency of assignor of claim in suit to testify with regard to transactions with or statements by a deceased person, where not expressly excluded by the terms of the statute, see note in 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 316.

As to the competency of an interested witness to testify with reference to transactions with deceased in which he did not participate, see notes in 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1179, and 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 320.

As to the applicability of the rule excluding testimony of an interested person in controversy over succession to estate, see note in 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 187, and especially pages 206-209, which deal with the extent of the exclusion, and pages 210-213, which deal with the different classes of persons to whom the disqualification applies.

In general.

This note is limited to cases considering the right of the relatives of a deceased person to testify in favor of the estate as affected by statutory provisions disqualifying designated persons as witnesses where one party to the action is deceased. It is to be noted that this disqualification in some instances goes to the competency of the witness, and in other cases merely to the character of the testimony. In the latter class of cases, if a case merely holds that the testimony offered is not of a character within the prohibitory provision of the statute, it is not within the scope of this note. Another class of cases excluded are those denying the right of the surviving spouse to testify on the ground that the testimony relates to communications between the parties during the life of the deceased. As thus limited, the question presented is whether relatives of the deceased are within the prohibitory or disqualifying provision of statutes of the character under consideration.

The common-law rule disqualifying as witnesses all persons interested in the event of the action has been changed by statutes permitting persons interested in the event of the suit to testify therein. About the only limitation of the statute is that which affects the right of one spouse to testify against the other, or the right of an interested person to testify where one party to the suit is deceased. Of course, the specific language of the statute is the controlling factor in determining the right of a relative to testify in favor of the estate of a deceased person. While in many respects the statutes differ in important matters, as a rule they may be divided into three classes: First, those which in general terms disqualify all persons having an interest in the event of the action; second, those which disqualify the parties to the action or transaction; third, those which disqualify persons in interest or parties to the action from testifying in their own favor or against the estate.

Where statute disqualifies person interested.

In construing these statutory provisions, the courts have evidenced a disposition so to construe them as to enforce them according to the spirit as well as the letter. In line with this purpose it is held that where the statute in effect disqualifies as witnesses persons having a pecuniary interest in the result of the suit, the surviving spouse or relative is not a competent witness in behalf of the estate. McDonald v. Harris (1901) 131 Ala. 359, 31 So. 548 (widow and son—action to enforce claim against the estate); Conner v. Root (1887) 11 Colo. 183, 17 Pac. 773 (statute disqualifies party to action or person interested in the event thereof—husband—action by personal representative to set aside gift).

Under a statute disqualifying as a witness a party to a suit or any person directly interested in the event thereof, if the adverse party sues or defends as administrator, etc., the interest of heirs or distributees of the estate is not direct, within the terms of the statute, and hence they are not disqualified as witnesses in favor of the estate. Freeman v. Freeman (1871) 62 Ill. 189 (husband an heir of distributee—action to enforce claim against the estate); Gregory v. Gregory (1906) 129 Ill. App. 96 (widow); Collar v. Patterson (1889) 137 Ill. 403, 27 N. E. 604, affirming (1890) 34 Ill. App. 632 (heir); Ledford v. Weber (1880) 7 Ill. App. 87 (husband).

Where statute disqualifies party to suit or transaction.

Under a statute providing in effect that where one party to the transaction is dead, the other party shall not be permitted to testify in his own favor, a surviving spouse or relative of the decedent is not disqualified as a witness in behalf of the estate. Hinchman v. Parlin & O. Co. (1896) 21 C. C. A. 273, 41 U. S. App. 301, 74 Fed. 698 (husband and administrator of deceased wife's estate—action involving title to property of estate); McIntyre v. Meldrim (1869) 40 Ga. 490 (widow—action to enforce claim against the estate); Jackson v. Jackson (1869) 40 Ga. 150 (widow—action against estate); Adams v. Jones (1869) 39 Ga. 479 (widow—action to enforce trust in favor of estate); Jaquith v. Davidson (1878) 21 Kan. 341 (widow, also executrix—action by estate to enforce claim); Watts v. Myers (1915) 93 Kan. 824, 145 Pac. 827 (widow and sole heir—action to set aside deed executed by decedent in his lifetime); Stacy v. Alexander (1911) 143 Ky. 152, 136 S. W. 150 (children of decedent—action affecting title to real estate); McCall v. Burk (1903) 25 Ky. L. Rep. 643, 76 S. W. 177 (widow—action to enforce trust); Compare with Bott v. Fitzpatrick (1845) 5 B. Mon. (Ky.) 397 (holding that where the father is the heir and legal representative of the deceased son, he is incompetent as a witness in favor of the estate in an action to enforce an obligation against it); Robinson v. Talmadge (1867) 97 Mass. 171 (widow—action on note); Litchfield v. Merritt (1869) 102 Mass. 520 (widow—action by estate on a note); Compare with Ford v. Ford (1835) 17 Pick. (Mass.) 418 (holding that where the heir releases his interest in a note sued upon by the administrator, he is a competent witness in favor of the estate); Stuhlmuller v. Ewing (1860) 39 Miss. 447 (widow—action to enforce claim against the estate); Smith v. Brinkley (1910) 151 Mo. App. 494, 132 S. W. 301 (children of decedent—action against estate); Norvell v. Cooper (1911) 155 Mo. App. 445, 134 S. W. 1095 (children of decedent—action to enforce claim against the estate).

Under a statute disqualifying as a witness a party to a transaction with a deceased person in an action where the adverse party is the personal representative of the decedent, a father who is the sole heir of a deceased son cannot testify in favor of the latter's estate to any personal transaction or communication between him and the decedent (Cushman v. Blakesly (1856) 3 G. Greene (Iowa) 542), but the disqualification is limited to evidence of this character, and does not extend to evidence relating to other matters, and the surviving spouse or heir is a competent witness in favor of the estate to matters not relating to personal transactions or communications with the deceased (Sweezy v. Collins (1875) 40 Iowa, 540; Bradley v. Kavanagh (1861) 12 Iowa, 273).

Under a statute disqualifying the opposite party as a witness to matters equally within the knowledge of a deceased person as to personal transactions or communications with the deceased, an heir of the deceased is not disqualified as a witness in favor of the estate. Moore v. Machen (1900) 124 Mich. 216, 82 N. W. 892 (son a competent witness to show demand made by him as agent for the decedent in the latter's lifetime).

But where the action is between two estates, a daughter and heir of one of the deceased persons is not a competent witness in favor of the estate in which she is interested. Penny v. Croul (1891) 87 Mich. 15, 13 L.R.A. 83, 49 N. W. 311.

However the husband of the daughter of the decedent has not such an interest in the estate as to disqualify him as a witness in favor of the estate, although the action is between two estates. Ashley v. Smith (1908) 152 Mich. 197, 115 N. W. 1052.

Where party to suit or person interested is disqualified as a witness against the estate.

Under statutes prohibiting persons interested in the event of the action from testifying in behalf of the party succeeding to a deceased person's title, or against the representative of a deceased person, as to any personal transaction or communication between the witness and the decedent, where the evidence is of a character designated by the statute, the next of kin of the deceased person are disqualified as witnesses in favor of the estate (Holcomb v. Holcomb (1880) 20 Hun (N. Y.) 156); but this qualification does not preclude the next of kin from testifying with regard to the declarations of the decedent, as bearing upon his mental capacity (Ibid.).

So, where the action is by one estate against another estate, the heir of one estate is disqualified as a witness in favor of the other estate, where the evidence is of the character designated by the statute. Parks v. Andrews (1890) 56 Hun, 391, 10 N. Y. Supp. 344.

Where the statute in effect disqualifies as witnesses persons who are necessary parties to the issue, or whose interest is adverse to the estate, it has been held that the surviving spouse or relatives of the deceased are not within the terms of the statute, and are not disqualified to testify as witnesses in favor of the estate. Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Cregor (1895) 150 Ind. 625, 50 N. E. 760 (widow and administratrix—action to recover for injuries to deceased, resulting in his death); Floyd v. Miller (1878) 61 Ind. 224 (widow—action to enforce claim against the estate); Denbo v. Wright (1876) 53 Ind. 226 (widow—action to enforce claim against estate); Skillen v. Jones (1873) 44 Ind. 136 (child—action by administrator to recover decedent's share in a partnership); Lewis v. Buskirk (1896) 14 Ind. App. 439, 42 N. E. 1118 (widow—action to enforce claim against the estate).

Under a statute providing that neither party shall testify against the other, where one party to an action is deceased, heirs, next of kin, or the surviving spouse is not disqualified as a witness in favor of the estate in which he is interested. Hughlett v. Conner (1873) 12 Heisk. (Tenn.) 83 (heirs—action involving title to land); Russell v. Beckert (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 195 S. W. 607 (widow). Compare with Anglin v. Barlow (1898) — Tex. Civ.

App. —, 45 S. W. 827, holding that the widow is not a competent witness in favor of her husband's estate in an action to recover property from a third person. The terms of the disqualifying statute are not stated.

Where one estate is suing another, however, the surviving spouse or heir of one of the decedents is not a competent witness in favor of the estate in which he is interested, since such testimony is against the other estate. Brown v. Marmaduke (1915) 248 Pa. 252, 93 Atl. 1021; Crosetti's Estate (1905) 211 Pa. 490, 60 Atl. 1081; Miller v. Miller (1890) 1 Pa. Dist. R. 95 (widow—action to enforce claim against the estate); Keener v. Zartman (1891) 144 Pa. 179, 22 Atl. 889 (heir—action to enforce claim against the estate—heir was also grantee of land from decedent). A. G. S.

WASHINGTON SUPREME COURT. (Department No. 1.)

STATE OF WASHINGTON EX REL.
MABEL I. MCGHEE

v.

SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR THE COUNTY OF PIERCE et al.

(— Wash. —, 170 Pac. 130.)

Habeas corpus — appeal — supersedeas — effect.

1. An appeal with supersedeas bond will not, in a habeas corpus proceeding to secure custody of a child, have the effect of restoring the child to the former custody pending appeal.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Mandamus — to compel court to retain jurisdiction of child.

2. Mandamus will not lie to compel a court which has changed the custody of a child in a habeas corpus proceeding, to provide for its retention within its jurisdiction pending appeal, if no application for such relief has been made to that court.

For other cases, see Mandamus, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — writ in aid of jurisdiction.

3. An appellate court cannot, in the absence of anything to show that steps have been taken to invest it with jurisdiction, issue a writ to control the custody of a child in aid of its jurisdiction.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(January 28, 1918.)

Note.—For effect of appeal as stay of judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, see annotation following this case, post, 923. L.R.A.1918C.

PROCEEDING by relator for an order requiring respondents to fix the amount of a supersedeas bond in a habeas corpus proceeding, and prohibiting entry of judgment awarding custody of the child pending the hearing of the application. Demurrer to the petition sustained and alternative writ quashed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Carroll A. Gordon, for relator:

An appeal lies from an order of discharge from custody in habeas corpus proceedings.

Re Garfinkle, 37 Wash. 650, 80 Pac. 188.

Habeas corpus is a civil proceeding, and an appeal therein without bond is ineffectual.

State v. Fenton, 30 Wash. 325, 70 Pac. 741; State ex rel. Roberts v. Superior Ct. 32 Wash. 143, 72 Pac. 1040.

Any judgment which alters the status quo may be stayed.

State ex rel. Byers v. Superior Ct. 28 Wash. 403, 68 Pac. 865.

Mandamus will issue if the fruits of the appeal would be lost by reason of the refusal to accept a supersedeas bond.

State ex rel. Denham v. Superior Ct. 28 Wash. 590, 68 Pac. 1051.

And in aid of the writ, the lower court may be restrained from further proceeding.

State ex rel. Barnard v. Board of Education, 19 Wash. 8, 40 L.R.A. 317, 67 Am. St. Rep. 706, 52 Pac. 317.

Mr. A. O. Burmeister also for relator.

Messrs. Henry Conger and A. L. Haight, for respondents:

The filing of the supersedeas bond will not operate to stay the execution of the lower court's order awarding the custody of a minor child to the petitioner in habeas corpus proceedings; and that being the only relief sought, the court did not err, and did not exceed his jurisdiction, in refusing to fix the amount of such bond.

State ex rel. Davenport v. Poindexter, 45 Wash. 37, 87 Pac. 1069; State v. Kirkpatrick, 54 Iowa, 373, 6 N. W. 258, 588; State v. Fenton, 30 Wash. 325, 70 Pac. 741; State ex rel. Hamilton v. Superior Ct. 56 Wash. 91, 105 Pac. 171.

Prohibition will not issue unless the proceedings of the lower court are without, or in excess of, its jurisdiction (Rem. & Bal. Code, § 1027); nor where the lower court has jurisdiction of the parties and the subject-matter (32 Cyc. 605).

Webster, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Prior to June 8, 1917, L. D. Oar and relator, Mable I. McGhee, were husband and wife, residing in the state of Nevada; Coral Emeline Oar, a minor child of the age of three years, being the issue of this marriage. On that date, by a decree of the district court of Nevada, the parties were divorced, the custody of the minor child being awarded to the mother and father respectively, for alternate periods of six months following the entry of the decree. Thereafter the relator married and removed with the minor child to Pierce county, Washington, where she now resides. After the expiration of the first period provided in the decree, the father, who still resides in Nevada, made application to the superior court of Pierce county by habeas corpus proceedings for the custody of the child, and upon the hearing thereof the court found that the father was a suitable person to have the care and custody of the child, and announced its decision that the child, which had been in the custody of the court during the pendency of the proceedings, be forthwith delivered to the petitioner therein. Whereupon relator applied for an order fixing the amount of a supersedeas bond to stay the judgment pending appeal to this court, which being denied, relator filed an original application in this court setting forth, in substance, the foregoing facts, and in addition thereto alleging that she is desirous of obtaining a review of the habeas corpus proceeding by appeal, and that, unless prevented, the father will remove the minor child from the jurisdiction of this court, thereby depriving relator of the fruits of such appeal in the event the same is successful. Relator prays that an order be issued by this court requiring the superior court to fix the amount of such supersedeas bond, and that it be prohibited from entering a judgment delivering the custody of the child to its father pending the hearing of this application. An alternative writ issued as prayed, and on the return day respondent demurred to the petition upon the ground that the facts therein stated are not sufficient to warrant the granting of the relief sought.

In support of the application relator contends that upon the execution of a supersedeas bond the judgment in the habeas corpus proceeding is stayed, and the custody of the child transferred to the relator, in whose custody it was when the proceeding was instituted. We cannot accede to this view. While we have held that an appeal will lie from a final judgment in habeas corpus proceedings, we have never held that such judgments may be superseded pending appeal. In State ex rel. Davenport v. Poindexter, 45 Wash. 37, 87 Pac. 1069, we said: "It is contended here by relators that the filing of the supersedeas bond had the effect of leaving all parties in the position they occupied at the commencement of the habeas corpus proceedings before respondent, and that, as they then had the possession and custody of the children, they became immediately entitled thereto again upon the giving of said stay bond, and that a writ should issue requiring respondent to direct the delivery of said minors to relators. We do not think this position tenable. Where minor children are involved a much different consideration is presented than obtains with reference to mere property rights. The welfare of the children is a matter of prime importance and public concern, and must be the subject of careful consideration at all stages of any proceeding wherein their possession, custody, or control is involved. In such a proceeding as this we do not think the giving of a supersedeas bond has any effect whatever upon the possession, custody, and control of the minor children in question. It being presumed that the order of the trial judge was correct, and that he was actuated by a consideration for the minors' welfare, it would be against public policy to have that welfare imperiled during an appeal, in the absence of a statute clearly permitting the staying of such orders. The trial court had jurisdiction to take said children into its possession, if it believed that their physical or moral welfare or other substantial interests necessitated such action."

This language is so apt as not to require further comment. To the same effect see State ex rel. Clark v. Superior Ct. 90 Wash. 80, 155 Pac. 398; State ex rel. Martin v. Poindexter, 43 Wash. 147, 86 Pac. 176; State ex rel. Gibson v. Superior Ct. 39

Wash. 115, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 554, 109 Am. St. Rep. 862, 80 Pac. 1108, 4 Ann. Cas. 229; Willis v. Willis, 165 Ind. 332, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, 75 N. E. 655, 6 Ann. Cas. 772; State v. Kirkpatrick, 54 Iowa, 373, 6 N. W. 588; 12 R. C. L. p. 1258; Re De Lemos, 143 Cal. 313, 76 Pac. 1115.

It is insisted, however, that unless relator is permitted to supersede the judgment, the father will remove the child from the state of Washington, thereby depriving the relator of the fruits of her appeal in the event of success. The answer to this contention is that the execution of the supersedeas bond will in no way affect the possession or custody of the child pending the appeal, nor prevent its removal from the state. It is not the policy of the law to require the doing of a useless thing, or the performance of an act that will be ineffectual for any purpose.

Neither can we treat the application as one for a writ of mandate directing the respondent to enter an order suspending the operation of the judgment pending the appeal, or to exercise discretion in making suitable provision for the retention of the child in the state during the pendency of the appeal, for the reason that it does not appear that any such application has been made to respondent, or that the superior court has refused to act in the matter. In the absence of such showing the writ will not issue from this court.

Nor can we, in the aid of our appellate and revisory jurisdiction, grant such relief. It is not shown that relator has given notice of appeal and filed an appeal bond as required by statute to invest this court with jurisdiction in furtherance or aid of which it is authorized to act.

For these reasons, we conclude that the demurrer to the petition should be sustained, and the alternative writ quashed.

Ellis, Ch. J., and Parker, Fullerton, and Main, JJ., concur.

Annotation—Effect of appeal as stay of judgment in habeas corpus proceedings.

This question has been previously treated in the note to Willis v. Willis, 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, and the cases in the present note are supplementary.

For habeas corpus decree as to custody of infant as res judicata, see the notes to Re King, 67 L.R.A. 783, and Knapp v. Tolan, 49 L.R.A.(N.S.) 83.

The holding of STATE EX REL. MCGHEE v. SUPERIOR Ct. ante, 921, that an appeal with supersedeas bond will not restore the custody of a child which has been changed in habeas corpus proceedings, is sustained by State ex rel. Davenport v. Poindexter (1906) 45 Wash. 37, 87 Pac. 1069, which is sufficiently set out in STATE EX REL. MCGHEE v. SUPERIOR Ct.

The case of Garner v. Gordon (1872) 41 Ind. 92, which takes a contrary view in a similar situation, is set out and overruled in Willis v. Willis, the case to which the earlier note 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 244, is appended.

The case of People ex rel. Young v. Stout (1894) 10 Misc. 247, 31 N. Y. Supp. 421, set out in the earlier note in 2 L.R.A.(N.S.) 245, was affirmed without opinion in (1895) 144 N. Y. 699, 39 N. E. 858.

But it is held in Goldsmith v. Valentine (1910) 35 App. D. C. 299, that, where the respondents in a habeas corpus proceeding gave a supersedeas bond on taking an appeal from an order awarding the custody of the infant son of the petitioner to petitioner's brother, who was not a party to the proceeding, the lower court had no power thereafter, on motion of the petitioner, to direct the respondents to transfer the custody of the infant to the petitioner's brother pending the appeal, upon his giving a counter bond. The court said that "rule 10 of this court provides, in effect, that an appeal from any order, judgment, or decree of the supreme court of the District shall operate as a stay of execution or supersedeas, if an approved bond is filed, 'conditioned for the successful prosecution of such appeal.' The conditions of this rule having been complied with, we see no reason why the appeal was not as effective in this case as in any other. Upon the perfecting of said appeal, the court below was ousted of its jurisdiction, and the cause transferred to this court. . . . The effect of the order of the court below might, and probably would, render futile the appeal taken. Such a situation, cannot, of course, be permitted. The parties to the appeal are entitled to have the status quo maintained during its pendency. Certainly, after they have given a bond to stay all further action until the determination of their appeal, they ought not to be put in a position where they could be kept out of the rights determined in that appeal."

And in Re Atcherley (1909) 19 Haw. 347, upon authority of Ex parte Ah Oi (1901) 13 Haw. 534, it was held that an appeal from an order of discharge on habeas corpus operates as a supersedeas notwithstanding the statutory provision that no person who has been discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus shall be again imprisoned or restrained for the same cause; the court took the view that a prisoner is not discharged within the meaning of that provision until his case is finally determined.

It will be observed that in the following cases the decision in habeas corpus proceedings from which the appeal was taken was against, and not in favor of, the petitioner, as in the MCGHEE CASE and the cases previously cited in this note:

Thus, in Re McKane (1894) 61 Fed. 205, it was contended that, pending appeal from denial of a writ of habeas corpus, requiring petitioner to do hard labor in accordance with the sentence of the state court was a violation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 766, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1292, providing for a stay of proceedings against the person in the state court in such cases; but the court held that the custody of petitioner should remain undisturbed, there being a rule which supplemented the statute by providing that, although "proceedings against the person" by the state court or state authority are to be deemed null and void, the custody in which the prisoner was when he applied for the writ shall remain undisturbed despite the pendency of his appeal.

The decision in McKane v. Durston (1894) 153 U. S. 684, 38 L. ed. 867, 14 Sup. Ct. Rep. 913, was that the continued execution of a sentence under a judgment of a state court in a criminal case, after an appeal to the United States Supreme Court from a decision of the United States circuit court denying a writ of habeas corpus, was not a violation of U. S. Rev. Stat. § 766, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 1292.

Where a prisoner, after conviction and sentence to imprisonment, but before commitment, obtains a writ of habeas corpus, and after hearing thereon is remanded to custody under the criminal proceedings, it is held, in State ex rel. Beekley v. McDonald (1913) 123 Minn. 84, 142 N. W. 1051, that an appeal by him from the order discharging the writ and so remanding him does not stay the criminal proceedings, so as to deprive the court of authority to issue a commitment upon such conviction and sentence pending the appeal. The court observed that the habeas corpus proceedings were no part of the criminal action, but in fact were in opposition thereto. An appeal in one proceeding or action does not stay proceedings in another, and the fact that the statute gives the right of appeal in habeas corpus proceedings, and exempts appellant from the necessity of giving a bond, in no wise affects the rule.

So it was held in State v. Fenton (1902) 30 Wash. 325, 70 Pac. 741, that an appeal from a judgment in habeas corpus proceedings adjudging petitioner properly restrained of his liberty under an information charging assault with intent to commit a felony did not stay proceedings in the criminal cause; and that a statute providing for a stay in either civil or criminal actions did not contemplate a stay in a case of this kind.

So, where one was in custody charged with a felony, and a writ of habeas corpus was applied for and denied, the supreme court in State ex rel. Hamilton v. Superior Ct. (1909) 56 Wash. 91, 105 Pac. 171, refused to stay the trial of the cause in the superior court pending appeal. The court observed that the case fell within the principle of State v. Fenton (Wash.) supra, where it was said: "This, unlike any other case, is the attempted injection of the habeas corpus proceedings in the trial of another case which is on appeal to this court. When the writ was denied by the lower court and the applicant remanded, that was the end of the case so far as the stay of the case then pending was concerned, and must necessarily be so to insure the orderly and effective administration of justice. This court placed a very liberal construction upon the statute when it sustained the right of appeal in habeas corpus cases, and it is not inclined, nor do we think the law compels us, to go to the extent of aiding defendants in criminal actions to prevent indefinitely a trial of causes on the merits by repeated applications for writs of habeas corpus, and appeals from the decisions in such cases if the applications are unsuccessful, which would be the result of sustaining appellant's contention. If this contention can be sustained at all, it can be so only on the theory that the appeal by virtue of itself worked a stay of proceedings. If there is a stay it is by force of the statute, and we are not cited to any statutory provision in that regard. The statutory provisions for a stay in either a civil or criminal action are found in §§ 6506 & 6529, Ballinger's Codes & Stat. [Pierce's §§ 1054, 1057], and neither contemplates a stay in a case of this kind."

While the question was not involved in Winnovich v. Emery (1908) 33 Utah, 345, 93 Pac. 988, the court stated that an appeal does not of its own force suspend judgment in a habeas corpus proceeding without any express statutory provision to that effect; and State v. Kirkpatrick (1880) 54 Iowa, 373, 6 N. W. 588, set out in the note in 2 L.R.A. (N.S.) 245, is cited to the proposition that, even in those states where an express right of an appeal is given by statute, the courts have held that the taking of an appeal does not suspend judgment.

It is held in Irwin v. Jackson (1864) 34 Ga. 101, that the filing of a bill of exceptions to the decision of the judge below in habeas corpus, remanding the relator, does not operate as a superse-deas; but the applicant must remain in the condition in which he is placed by the judgment, whether exception be taken or not. See also McLendon v. Smith (1881) 68 Ga. 36, where the court, commenting upon the Irwin Case (Ga.) supra, states that it is questionable whether, pending an appeal to the supreme court from a decision on a writ of habeas corpus refusing to release a prisoner, the court can discharge him from custody on any terms. Fullerton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent, plaintiff below, while in the employ of the appellant as a longshoreman, was assaulted by members of a riotous mob and severely injured. At the time of the injury a strike was pending by union longshoremen of the cities of Seattle and Tacoma, and the mob making the assault was composed of such longshoremen and their sympathizers. The respondent instituted this action to recover in damages for his injuries, basing his cause of action upon an oral contract which he alleges was entered into between himself and the appellant, by the terms of which the appellant promised and agreed to afford and furnish him "ample protection from violence, injury, or hurt from said union longshoremen, or any others co-operating with or aiding them, and to prevent any injury, hurt, or damage being done to plaintiff while being employed by the defendant in any labor or service assigned to him by defendant, and to afford and furnish plaintiff a safe place in which to work free from assault on the part of any persons whatsoever." The appellant took issue on the complaint by a general denial, and by a plea of settlement and discharge. The settlement was denied by a reply, and on the issues thus framed a trial was had which resulted in a verdict and judgment in the respondent's favor. This appeal is prosecuted from the judgment entered.

Noticing the errors assigned in the order in which the appellant presents them, the first is that the evidence was insufficient to establish the contract alleged. But this question does not seem to us to require extended discussion. The respondent himself and a witness whom he brought to his support testified emphatically to the contract. While the contract is denied by the representative of the appellant who did the hiring, and the denial is supported by the testimony of others to a greater or less degree, it is conceded that there was danger of such an assault, and that the question of protection was discussed at the time of the hiring. It was shown, moreover, that for the purpose of protection the respondent was given his board and lodging at a pier of the appellant which was protected by a guard, and that some form of protection was afforded him and his collaborators at all of the places where he was put to work. In the light of this testimony it was clearly for the jury to say whether the contract was entered into; and, this being so, their verdict cannot be overturned by an appellate court whose province is confined to a review of the record for error.

It is next contended that the contract alleged, conceding it to have been proved, is void. If we have correctly understood the appellant's learned counsel, the contention is that it is so for three principle reasons: (1) Because it is impossible of performance; (2) because it is against public policy; and (3) because it is a contract of insurance, and was not entered into in conformity with the statutes regulating insurance.

It is true there are certain agreements which do not give rise to a liability by non-performance for the reason stated; as, for example, an agreement incapable of performance in itself because contrary to the laws of nature, or agreement to do an act forbidden by some legal principle or by statute law. So, also, the modern cases generally hold that a contract or agreement incapable of performance in fact by reason of the existence of a state of things which renders performance impossible will not give rise to a liability on breach; this because the parties are presumed to have contracted with reference to the existence of a state of things making performance possible. But it is elementary law that, when the contract is to do a thing which is possible in itself, the promisor will be liable for a breach thereof notwithstanding it was beyond his power individually to perform it; for it is his own fault if he undertakes to do a thing which to him is an impossibility. If, for illustration, a man for a sufficient consideration undertakes to pay a given sum of money at a fixed time, having neither the means on hand nor the power to procure the means to make the undertaking good, no one will suppose that the breach of the obligation gives rise to no liability. Or perhaps a more nearly analogous illustration is found in that class of contracts where a man undertakes to do a thing incapable of performance without the aid and assistance of others, as when he undertakes to furnish the materials and erect a building, having on hand neither the necessary materials nor the ability to perform by himself the necessary labor involved. In no such case has it ever been held that the breach of the contract gave rise to no liability because the contract was impossible of performance.

It appears to us that the case at bar falls within the last, rather than within the first, of these principles. The contract was not impossible of performance within itself, nor is such a contract forbidden by any legal principle or by any statute law, nor was there any change of condition in the subject-matter of the contract which rendered its performance impossible. It may have been impossible of performance by the appellant, in whose behalf the promise was made, but manifestly its inability to perform it as an individual or corporation did not relieve it from liability for its breach so long as the contract was capable of being legally performed.

The argument in support of the second reason given for holding the contract void is based on the assumption that protection could not be given without the employment of a private armed force, and that to employ such a force is contrary to the policy of the law. It may be that, had the contract between the parties provided in express terms for protection by a privately employed armed force, it would have been so far unlawful as to give rise to no liability for its breach. But we cannot think this contract so provides. Certainly it does not do so in express terms, and it cannot be held that it does so impliedly, unless there is no other means by which protection could be afforded. Seemingly other ways might have been adopted. The appellant might have done effectively what it attempted to do and did ineffectively; it might have erected an impassable barrier across the way of approach which the rioters were obliged to take in order to reach the respondent's place of work. Again, it might have called upon the public authorities for protection. Government is not as yet impotent, even as against rioting strikers, and seemingly, had proper representations been made to the proper executive officers, a lawful force could have been provided which would have afforded ample protection. Other means equally lawful might be suggested, but these are sufficient to show that the appellant, to perform the contract, did not have to resort to an unlawful means solely. We are aware that the evidence tends to show that the appellant did apply to the police of the city where the riot occurred for protection, and that certain police officers were sent to the place for that purpose, who failed to quell the rioters or prevent the doing of the riotous acts which resulted in the respondent's injury. But this does not prove an exhaustion of the possible means of protection; it proves only that the protection attempted to be afforded was insufficient.

The third reason given for holding the contract void is equally untenable. This was in no sense a contract of insurance within the meaning of the laws relating to that subject. The contract is a stranger to the books because of its novelty, but it differs in no sense in its essentials from other contracts by which one person for a sufficient consideration agrees with another to do or not to do a particular thing. It has none of the elements of an insurance contract not found in ordinary contracts by which one person agrees to do some act or perform some service for the benefit of another. In this connection the appellant lays stress upon the words "absolute protection," used by the witnesses in defining the terms of the contract, and argues therefrom that it is an insurance contract because they cover every possible species of harm that can happen, no matter from what cause. But in answer it is sufficient to say that the appellant, in order to give the words this extraordinary meaning, ignores the construction in which they were used. As we read the record, the witnesses meant no more than to say that they were guaranteed absolute protection from injuries caused by riotous longshoremen and their sympathizers; not protection against injuries that might be received in other ways. But, were the words as broad in meaning as the appellant construes them to be, still, in our opinion, it would not be an insurance contract as that form of contract is defined by the statutes. Assuredly, when a master employs a servant, he may enter into a binding agreement with him to protect him against the hazards of the employment, or the hazards surrounding the employment, without resorting to the forms of contract prescribed by the Insurance Code.

Another contention is that the respondent was not in the appellant's employ at the time of the injury. The evidence does indeed show that he was working for the benefit of another at that time, but it also shows that he was doing so while under contract to work for appellant. The record does not make very clear the relation existing between the various dock owners and shipping lines involved in the controversy, but it can be gathered therefrom that the appellant maintained in its employ men whom it farmed out to others as they were needed for particular purposes, paying the men itself, and receiving its remuneration from the others for whom the men actually worked. The respondent was one of such men and plainly was at all times in the appellant's employ.

As we have said, the appellant pleaded as an affirmative defense a satisfaction and settlement in full of the differences between itself and respondent. On the trial it introduced in evidence a writing dated subsequent to the injury, signed by the respondent, acknowledging the receipt of "$11 in full payment of the amount due me to date." On the margin of the writing, under columns headed "Regular Time" and "Overtime" was a statement showing the number of hours the appellant had worked, with the rate of wages per hour, the total aggregating the sum of $11. No evidence was offered showing or tending to show that the receipt was intended as a full settlement of the demand the respondent might have against the appellant for his injury, or that it was anything other than it purported on its face to be, namely, a receipt for wages theretofore earned. At the proper time during the course of the trial the appellant requested the court to give the jury the following instruction: "If you find that the plaintiff signed a release in writing and acknowledged receipt of payment from defendant in full of the amount due up to date, and if you find that the receipt was signed subsequent to the alleged injury of plaintiff, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

The request was refused, and error is assigned thereon. In the form presented it was clearly not error to refuse to give the instruction. Since the appellant admitted his signature to the writing, and there was otherwise no dispute as to its genuineness, to give the instruction in the form requested would have been, in effect, a direction to find for the defendant. The question, of course, was whether there had been a settlement and discharge of the liability for which the respondent sued. The receipt on its face purported to relate to another matter, and did not by itself in any manner tend to prove the issue; much less was it conclusive evidence on the question.

But perhaps the appellant means that the proffered instruction was equivalent to a request for an instruction on the question of settlement and discharge, and that the court should at least have submitted the matter to the jury on a proper instruction. But, so construing it, we cannot agree with the contention. As we say, the receipt did not on its face purport to be a discharge of the liability sued upon, and there was no extrinsic evidence tending to show that it was intended for that purpose. This being the state of the record, the court did not err in failing to notice the plea of settlement and discharge in its instructions.

Among its instructions the court gave the jury the following: "If you find from the evidence that the plaintiff, while at the Great Northern dock in Seattle, was informed that he was about to go to Tacoma, if he was willing, to work on the deck unloading the Nome City, and that said work was to be done for persons other than the defendant, and that the people operating the dock in Tacoma at which the Nome City was to land had promised to provide protection, and if you find that the dock owners in Tacoma failed to provide such protection, then the defendant would not be liable, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

The instruction is claimed as error because of the inclusion of the words italicized. But an examination of the record shows that the instruction was a compound of a number of instructions requested by the appellant, in one of which the very words objected to were requested to be given. This being true, the appellant is not in a position to complain. But in any event the instruction was not error from the appellant's point of view. It was an instruction in its favor, and included no element for which there was not justification in the evidence.

In its instruction on the measure of damages the court told the jury that, if they found for the respondent, he was entitled to recover such a sum as would be a fair compensation for the "pain and anguish of mind and body" he had suffered caused by the assault and battery complained of. It is objected to this that there is neither an allegation in the complaint nor evidence in the record that the respondent suffered any pain and anguish of mind and body. It is true that the complaint does not set forth in so many words that the treatment he received at the hands of the rioters caused him anguish of mind or pain of body, but the facts of the assault are set forth in detail, and there was a demand for general damages. The proofs concerning the injuries inflicted were as minute as the allegations of the complaint, and from them no other result than anguish of mind and pain of body could follow. But, if this were not so, the cause was tried upon the theory that the complaint was sufficient in these respects, and this is a waiver of the objection, however effective such an objection might have been if suggested at the proper time. The case of Bennett v. L.R.A.1918C.

Oregon-Washington R. & Nav. Co. 83 Wash. 64, 145 Pac. 62, is not in point on the question presented here. There the court submitted to the jury the question whether the injured plaintiff would probably suffer future mental anguish, and it was held that there was no evidence in the record which justified the instruction of the court. On the other hand, it was clearly recognized that mental anguish was a proper subject for the consideration of the jury in all cases where there is "evidence of a state of facts from which the jury might find mental anguish."

It is urged further with reference to this instruction that it is erroneous in that it assumes that the respondent suffered pain and anguish by reason of the assault, whereas this was a question for the determination of the jury. But we cannot think the objection well taken. The instruction as a whole shows that the court's statements wherein he referred to facts were made hypothetically, leaving it to the jury to say whether or not the conclusion was justified by the evidence.

Other objections to the instructions were based on a different view of the law from that adopted by the trial court, and are sufficiently answered by what we have said on cognate questions.

The jury returned a verdict for the sum of $500. This is objected to as excessive. The objection, however, is based on the contention that the complaint contains no claim for damages on account of physical pain and mental anguish suffered. As no contention is made that the verdict would be excessive were these elements of damage within the province of the jury to consider, and as we have concluded they were within its province, no further consideration of the objection is necessary.

The judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Contract by employer to protect employee from personal violence by strikers.

The decision in HANSEN v. DODWELL DOCK & WAREHOUSE CO. ante, 925, upholding a contract by an employer to protect an employee from the violence of strikers as against the objections that it was impossible of performance, that it was against public policy, and that it was a contract of insurance not entered into in conformity with the statutes regulating insurance, is undoubtedly sound. It does not necessarily follow, however, that a breach of such a contract entitles the servant to recover for personal injuries received from strikers, in an action ex contractu based upon the breach. This point is apparently not considered in this case. It is to be noted in this connection, however, that the employee was injured while he was engaged in the line of his employment, and there was therefore presented the question of the duty of the employer, who had expressly assumed the duty of protecting his employee from apprehended violence while at work. The only case found at all similar as to the facts is Lewis v. Taylor Coal Co. (Foreman v. Taylor Coal Co.) (1902) 112 Ky. 845, 57 L.R.A. 447, 66 S. W. 1044, which holds that the breach of an agreement to protect an employee from the violence of strikers will not give a right of action under statutes making an employer liable for the death of an employee through his negligent or wrongful act, and also providing that an action for injury to the person except by assault shall not abate on the death of the injured person. In this case, however, the employee was injured by strikers after he had finished his labor for the day and had gone to his home.

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Appellant instituted garnishment proceedings against respondents, averring that the assignor of appellant was a creditor of the defendants Alexander; that at a time when he was such, they transferred a stock of goods to the respondent corporation, and failed to comply with the Bulk Sales Law, and that the individual respondent holds the stock of goods as a common-law assignee for the benefit of the corporation's creditors.

The facts are stipulated as follows: J. D. Alexander was engaged in the bicycle and motorcycle business in Spokane. On September 6, 1914, William Maskell received personal injuries through the negligence of one of Alexander's employees. On September 23, 1914, the Spokane Cycle & Auto Supply Company was incorporated by Alexander and other parties acting in his interest. The capital stock was $125,000, divided into 1,250 shares of the par value of $100. On October 15, 1914, Alexander transferred his entire business, credits, good will, etc., to the corporation, and 750 shares of its capital stock were issued to him. The remainder of the capital stock was never issued. At the time of the transfer Alexander owed on bills and accounts payable approximately $23,000. There was then owing to him on bills and accounts receivable approximately $27,000, and the value of the merchandise excluding credits, fixtures, good will, etc., transferred by him to the corporation, was $45,000. All of Alexander's indebtedness save $6,800, for which the corporation gave its notes, was afterwards paid by it. It collected all the indebtedness owing to him, and continued to carry on the business as he had theretofore conducted it. Alexander received all the stock issued as the consideration for the transfer of his business to the corporation, and he was always the only real shareholder; other holdings being purely formal for the purpose of completing the corporate organization.

In December, 1914, Maskell brought an action against Alexander to recover damages for the injuries sustained by him through the negligence of Alexander's employees. The action was contested, liability being denied, but resulted in a judgment for $4,000 and costs against Alexander. Desiring to appeal, he applied to the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland to execute a supersedeas bond to stay the judgment pending the appeal. The Fidelity company knew that Alexander had transferred his business to the Cycle company between the time of the accident and the time of application. It furnished the bond as requested, for compensation, taking from Alexander an indemnity agreement, with which was deposited forty-five shares of the Cycle company stock as security for its performance. The judgment against Alexander was affirmed by this court on May 8, 1916, (Maskell v. Alexander, 91 Wash. 363, 157 Pac. 872), and judgment was rendered thereon against the Fidelity company as surety on the supersedeas bond. When the remittitur went down the Fidelity company paid over to Maskell the amount of the judgment, interest, costs, and accrued costs, and received from him an assignment of the judgment.

On September 18, 1916, the Cycle company executed to the respondent Wilson a common-law assignment of all its property for the benefit of all of its creditors, and shortly thereafter he took possession of the property, and has since managed it for the benefit of the creditors. At the time the transfer of the business was made by Alexander to the corporation organized by him, he was solvent. There was no intent on his part to defraud anyone, the corporation having been formed by him in good faith as a business proposition. In making the transfer the Bulk Sales Act was utterly ignored, and no affidavit or statement as required by it was made by Alexander or required by the corporation. Of the 750 shares of Cycle company stock issued and delivered to Alexander the appellant still had the forty-five shares which Alexander had pledged to it to indemnify it for becoming surety on the supersedeas bond, and 703 shares of the stock in the hands of Alexander were pledged to one Crandall to secure an indebtedness of about $750 owed by Alexander to Crandall. The value of the assets of the Cycle company at the time of the trial was $28,961.49 more than the amount of its liabilities.

Judgment was entered on the stipulated facts that the 703 shares of stock pledged to Crandall were subject to the judgment assigned to appellant, and they were ordered sold in satisfaction of the judgment subject to Crandall's claim. Other relief was denied appellant, the theory of the court being that the transfer of the stock of goods in bulk to the corporation organized by Alexander was not a sale within the meaning of the Bulk Sales Law. The Bulk Sales Law, so-called, provides: "Whenever L.R.A.1918C.

any person shall bargain for, or purchase any stock of goods, wares or merchandise in bulk, for cash, or on credit, and shall pay any part of the purchase price, or execute or deliver to the vendor, thereof, or to his order, or to any person for his use, any promissory note, or other evidence of indebtedness for said purchase price, or any part thereof, without first having demanded and received from said vendor, or from his agent, the statement provided for in § 5296 and verified as there provided, and without paying, or seeing to it that the purchase money of the said property is applied to the payment of the bona fide claim of the creditors of the vendor as shown upon such verified statement, share and share alike, such sale, or transfer shall be fraudulent and void." Rem. & Bal. Code § 5297.

Section 5296 preceding provides that "it shall be the duty of every person who shall bargain for or purchase any stock of goods, wares or merchandise in bulk, for cash or on credit, before paying to the vendor, or his agent, or representative, or delivering to the vendor, or his agent, any part of the purchase price thereof, or any promissory note, or other evidence therefor, to demand of and receive from such vendor, or agent, . . . a written statement, sworn to substantially as hereinafter provided, of the names and addresses of all the creditors of said vendor, to whom said vendor may be indebted, together with the amount of the indebtedness due or owing, and to become due or owing, by said vendor to each of such creditors; and it shall be the duty of said vendor, or agent, to furnish such statement, which shall be verified by an oath [then giving the form of the oath]."

We shall not follow counsel over the extended field of discussion as to whether or not Maskell at the time of the transaction involved was the creditor of Alexander within the meaning of the Bulk Sales Law, for the reason that we are of the opinion, as was the court below, that the transfer was not a sale within the Bulk Sales Law.

The statute uses the words "cash" and "credit," in regulating such transfers as contradistinguished from each other. The common meaning of the word "cash" is "money." 1 Words & Phrases, 995.

We have held that the object of the Bulk Sales Law was to prevent the vendor, usually a retail merchant, from selling his stock of goods, pocketing the proceeds, and leaving his creditors remediless (McAvoy v. Jennings, 44 Wash. 79, 87 Pac. 53; Kasper v. Spokane Merchants Asso. 87 Wash. 447, 151 Pac. 800), and in the latter case that no such result followed where the property was so disposed of as to make it available to the creditors; and hence, the reason for the rule failing, the rule itself failed.

We certainly would not hold that a creditor was remediless where a merchant transferred his stock of merchandise in bulk to another for an adequate exchange of real estate; for the real estate would be as available to the creditors as the stock of goods. While we might be disposed, in upholding the objects of the act, to consider commercial paper, bonds, warrants, and other securities as the equivalent of cash, because of their easy disposition and convertibility into cash, for the protection of creditors, such a case is not analogous to that here.

Where no fraudulent intent taints the transaction, a debtor may transfer his property to a corporation which he has formed in consideration of the issuance to him of its capital stock, and of that his creditors cannot complain. The corporate stock is as available for the satisfaction of the claim of creditors after the transfer of the merchandise as the merchandise was before.

"There was nothing illegal or improper in the formation of the plaintiff company, nor in the transfer to it by Holt & Chipman of the property in question. At the time the company was formed, that firm appears to have been solvent, and there is nothing to show that it was intended as a fraud upon their present or future creditors. It was not a withdrawal of their property from the grasp of creditors. On the contrary, it remained subject to their claims, though in a changed form. The interest of the partners in the corporation was represented by stock. This stock was as much liable to the demands of creditors as was the property itself before the formation of the company." Coaldale Coal Co. v. National State Bank, 142 Pa. 288, 21 Atl. 811.

See also Plaut v. Billings-Drew Co. 127 Mich. 11, 86 N. W. 399; Kingman v. Mowry, 182 Ill. 256, 74 Am. St. Rep. 169, 55 N. E. 330; Densmore Commission Co. v. Shong, 98 Wis. 380, 74 N. W. 114.

We will not, of course, countenance a mere transmutation of the business of individuals into a corporate business and a fraudulent manipulation of its stock in such a way as to deprive the creditors of any remedy against the individual debtors. But as we view the present case appellant has little or nothing of which to complain. It is not hurt. It has almost the entire capital stock in its possession and control, subject to some slight indebtedness, with a large margin of assets over the liabilities, apparently amply sufficient, if properly administered, to satisfy appellant's indebtedness. Consequently, as to the particular case before us, we might say that appellants' right is limited to the satisfaction of its claim. It does not extend to enforcing its satisfaction out of some particular property of the debtor or by some particular means.

The judgment below was right, and is affirmed.

Ellis, Ch. J., and Chadwick, Mount, and Morris, JJ., concur.

Annotation—Applicability of Bulk Sales Law to transfer to corporation or partnership organized to take over the business.

Generally as to applicability of Bulk Sales Law to sale of an undivided interest, see annotation in L.R.A.1917D, 623. And in connection with the present question see especially the following cases as set out in that note, which are also within the scope of the present annotation because involving transfers made to form a partnership to carry on the existing business: Marlow v. Ringer (1917) — W. Va. —, L.R.A. 1917D, 619, 91 S. E. 386; Daly v. Sumpster Drug Co. (1913) 127 Tenn. 412, 155 S. W. 167, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 1101; Yancey v. Lamar-Rankin Drug Co. (1913) 140 Ga. 359, 78 S. E. 1078; and Virginia-Carolina Chemical Co. v. Bouchelle (1913) 12 Ga. App. 661, 78 S. E. 51.

This leaves for further discussion in this annotation merely those cases in which there was a transfer of the whole L.R.A.1918C.

of the stock in trade to a corporation or partnership organized to take over and carry on the business. But few cases have passed upon this phase of the question, and they, like those above referred to, furnish a diversity of conclusion. Upon the one hand is the holding in MASKELL v. ALEXANDER, ante, 929, to the effect that a transfer of an entire business without any fraudulent intent to a corporation organized to take over the same in consideration for capital stock is not a transfer within the Washington Bulk Sales Law (Rem. & Bal. Code 1915, § 5297), which provides that a purchaser of any stock of goods, wares, or merchandise in bulk for cash or on credit without giving certain notices is fraudulent and void. This decision was upon the ground that the sale was not for cash, but for corporate stock, which was as available for the satisfaction of the claims of creditors after the transfer of the merchandise as the merchandise was before, wherefore the transaction did not violate the object of the law, which it was said was to prevent a vendor from selling his stock of goods, pocketing the proceeds, and leaving his creditors remediless.

And even in jurisdictions where the Bulk Sales Acts are regarded not as prohibiting sales in bulk, but as merely prescribing a rule of evidence, at least in so far as they declare that sales of merchandise without compliance with their terms will be presumed to be fraudulent and void, and under which such sales are held to be only presumptively fraudulent, it seems that a transfer to a corporation organized to take over a business, even though it be regarded as primarily within the act, cannot be avoided as in violation thereof, where the parties thereto establish that they acted in good faith, and not for the purpose of defrauding creditors. This was the position taken in Thorpe v. Pennock Mercantile Co. (1906) 99 Minn. 22, 108 N. W. 940, 9 Ann. Cas. 229, where a corporation was formed to take over the business of an insolvent partnership, and in which the contest was between the creditors of the partnership and the creditors of the successor corporation. The court applied the rules that in the absence of fraud the partnership may sell and transfer the property of the firm, and that the purchaser takes it free from any equity on the part of the simple creditors of the partnership, and that the fact that the transfer was made to the corporation which was organized by the partners for the purpose of carrying on the business was not in itself evidence of fraud; and said that, while such a transaction might be fraudulent, each case must be judged by its own facts, and that the evidence under consideration failed to show intent to defraud either in the formation of the corporation or in the transfer to it of the partnership assets.

But admitting that a transfer to a corporation organized to take over a business is within the purview of the act, and that there is fraud in fact, a contrary conclusion is reached. Thus, in West Shore Furniture Co. v. Murphy (1913) 141 N. Y. Supp. 835, in construing and applying New York Bulk Sales Law (Personal Prop. Law, § 44, Consol. Laws, chap. 41), which declares that sales of merchandise in bulk "shall be presumed to be fraudulent and void," unless, etc., it was held that where the insolvent continuing partner of a mercantile firm transferred his whole stock in trade to a newly created corporation in consideration for the whole capital stock, and then conveyed a portion of the stock to relatives to whom he was indebted, pursuant to a scheme devised for the purpose of excluding other creditors,—the transaction was clearly fraudulent as to such other creditors.

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

HARRY A. LEE et al., by Next Friend,
Appts.,
v.

MRS. A. H. HOFFMAN et al.

(— Iowa, —, 166 N. W. 565.)

Constitutional law — reasonableness of statute.

1. Mere unreasonableness does not render a statute unconstitutional.

For other cases, see Statutes, I. c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Legislature — delegation of power — exclusion from school.

2. The delegation by the legislature to school boards, of power to determine whether or not youths who are members of fraternal societies or are soliciting such membership shall be admitted to the public schools, does not render the statute invalid. For other cases, see Constitutional Law, I. d, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Constitutional law — class legislation — exclusion from school.

3. Exclusion from public schools of pupils affiliating with fraternal organizations is not unconstitutional as class legislation.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. a, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — personal rights.

4. Forbidding pupils in a public school to affiliate with a fraternal society without the sanction of the school authorities does not unconstitutionally interfere with personal rights of the pupils.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. b, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Schools — validity of rules.

5. A rule of a school board is not void for unreasonableness if it is a mere re-enactment of the statute which authorizes it.

For other cases, see Schools, I. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — The right to forbid a student's affiliation with a secret society is discussed in the notes to Wayland v. School Directors, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 352, and University of Mississippi v. Waugh, L.R.A.1915D, 588. L.R.A.1918C.

Constitutional law — due process — absence of hearing.

6. A rule of a school board providing for notice to the parents of a pupil who affiliates with a secret society, and suspension of the pupil from school in case of failure to offer a satisfactory excuse for his conduct, is not void for want of due process of law.

For other cases, see Constitutional Law, II. b, 7, c, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the District Court for Polk County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to obtain reinstatement in certain public schools from which plaintiffs were suspended for violation of rules enacted by the school directors which were alleged to be unconstitutional. Affirmed.

Statement by Salinger, J.:

The plaintiffs and others in the same class, and all minors, were by the defendants excluded from the benefits of a public school under a rule adopted by the defendant board. A petition seeking a mandatory order to restore the plaintiffs to admission in said schools was dismissed, and the plaintiffs appeal.

Mr. O. M. Brockett for appellants.

Messrs. Stipp, Perry, Bannister, & Starzinger, for appellees:

The petition as amended does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

Salinger, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

I. The argument of appellant assumes that legislative enactments are open to every objection that may be made to a mere rule or to an ordinance. And, in support of attack upon the statute upon which appellees rely for authority to do what they did, appellant refers us to cases which nullify mere rules and ordinances, and to general language in these cases which, broad as it is, must still be limited to rules and ordinances. See Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 356, 30 L. ed. 220, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1064; Bear v.

Some objections good as to ordinances or rules are not valid objections to a statute. Wherefore we will at this time deal with the objections made by appellant as though they were addressed to the statute alone. This eliminates two objections often lodged against ordinances or rules, to wit, that grant from the legislature is lacking, and mere unreasonableness. An ordinance or a rule may be void because the legislature has not authorized it. Manifestly, every statute is authorized by the legislature; and no statute is invalid because no other statute grants power to enact it. Again, no legislative enactment is void merely because it is unreasonable. It is a universal rule that unreasonableness in a statute is of no importance except on the question of what was intended by the legislature; that if there is no room for construction the law is what the act says, no matter how unreasonable that is. The remedy is not to substitute what the courts deem reasonable, but an appeal to the legislature. That a law is unreasonable merely does not make it unconstitutional.

II. Appellants contend that the statutes in question are invalid because they delegate certain powers. It is true they do in a sense delegate both legislative and judicial power, and we think that this is permissible. As far back as Wayman v. Southard, 10 Wheat. 1, 6 L. ed. 253, Chief Justice Marshall said that Congress can delegate "what powers it may rightfully exercise itself;" and grants of legislative power to municipal corporations and administrative boards have uniformly been sustained. See Martin v. Witherspoon, 135 Mass. 175; Sabre v. Rutland R. Co. 86 Vt. 347, 85 Atl. 694, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 1269; State ex rel. Webster v. Superior Ct. 67 Wash. 37, L.R.A. 1915C, 287, 120 Pac. 861, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 78; Denny's Case, 143 Iowa, 474, 121 N. W. 1066; Re Sioux City Stock Yards Co. 149 Iowa, 5, 11, 127 N. W. 1102. Acts have been upheld which authorized medical boards to refuse or revoke certificates of qualification for certain causes. France v. State, 57 Ohio St. 1, 47 N. E. 1041. It is competent for the legislature to delegate to a county auditor the power to determine the character of the security to be given for damages resulting from the taking of private property for drainage purposes. L.R.A.1918C.

If there be involved a delegation of judicial power, such delegation will not avoid the statute. See Re Sioux City Stock Yards Co. 149 Iowa, 5, 11, 127 N. W. 1102; State ex rel. Atty. Gen. v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, 5 N. E. 228; Hunter v. Colfax Coal Co. 175 Iowa, 310, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1037, 157 N. W. 145, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 803, 11 N. C. C. A. 886; State v. Mason City & Ft. D. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 516, 52 N. W. 490; State Sav. & Commercial Bank v. Anderson, 165 Cal. 437, L.R.A.1915E, 675, 132 Pac. 755; Re Kollock, 165 U. S. 526, 41 L. ed. 813, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 444; Union Bridge Co. v. United States, 204 U. S. 364, 51 L. ed. 523, 27 Sup. Ct. Rep. 367; Monongahela Bridge Co. v. United States, 216 U. S. 177, 54 L. ed. 435, 30 Sup. Ct. Rep. 356.

We gather the complaint is, not that either legislative or judicial powers or both are delegated, but that the delegation is arbitrary and unregulated. For instance, it is said there is an attempt to delegate arbitrary and unregulated discretion to school boards to determine whether or not the youths who are members of certain fraternities or societies shall be admitted to the privileges and benefits of public schools; that as to any who are already admitted these statutes give unregulated and unlimited power to determine which of them having such associations shall be admitted and which excluded, and because unregulated, undefined, and unlimited discretion is given to sanction or refuse to sanction certain sororities or associations. The statutes in question are § 2782a, Code Supplement 1913, as amended by Act of the 37th General Assembly. The powers delegated are not "blanket powers." The right to act at all is limited (a) to those who are pupils; (b) to pupils who become members of or solicit other pupils to become members of any fraternity or society wholly or partially formed from pupils, or to take any part in the organization or formation of any such society; (c) to determining whether the inhibition may be waived as to some societies or associations; (d) to enforce the statutes by the adoption of rules and regulations carrying penalties which the statutes specifically describe; (e) they provide for an investigation and that the penalty shall be inflicted only after such investigation has satisfied a majority of the directors that the statute has been violated.

Whatever objection there may be to this, it is not that it is an unbridled delegation. It could not well be more specific without making it unnecessary to delegate at all. If the legislature has power to delegate, then, of necessity, it has power to leave to others the details to effectuate the declared legislative policy. As said, if this be not so, the legislature could do nothing but make the rules and prescribe each step to be taken. On this theory it can delegate, provided it delegates nothing.

It is true these statutes also contain broad provisions giving the board full power and authority to make, adopt, and modify all rules and regulations which in their judgment and discretion may be necessary for the proper governing of the school, and they authorize punishment for violation of any such rule. But this general language must be limited by the entire scope and purpose of the enactment, which is, not to deal with all possible rules, but with rules to enforce the provisions of these statutes. Be that as it may, nothing but an enforcement of rules in aid of these statutes is complained of. It will be time to deal with the validity of the broader language in these statutes when there shall be before us an attempt to enforce some rules not specifically authorized by these. We shall have occasion to speak later to what the attitude of the courts should be where unconstitutionality is asserted because of something that might be done.

III. One complaint is that the statute works an arbitrary differentiation and discrimination—is arbitrary class legislation—because it authorizes exclusion for such affiliation. The argument is that there is an arbitrary grouping, in that pupils who belong to no such societies, and those that affiliate with them on sanction, are the only ones who retain the privilege of school. We do not think that such a classification constitutes inhibited “class legislation.” The statute avoids all that constitutes such legislation. It puts all who are of the class to be affected into that class. It includes no one therein who should not be. It deals with none save enrolled pupils. Only such pupils need the sanction of the board to affiliate with these societies. All of them need it. It attempts no distinctions between those who are affected. It makes no arbitrary distinctions, say, that pupils having red hair or those of English parentage may affiliate without obtaining the sanction. Waiving the distinction between statutes and rules to which we have adverted, and accepting cases nullifying rules at their broadest, and we find that when mere rules were annulled it was because of discriminations as unjustifiable as those based on the color of hair or nationality. In Clark v. Board of Directors, 24 Iowa, 266, there was a discrimination against pupils because they were negroes, and all said for the right to enjoy school privileges must be read in the light of that fact. What the case turns on is not shown by general language concerning abstract rights, but by declarations that the discretion of the board does not justify assigning to different schools because parents happen, to be Irish or German or Catholic or Protestant; that if it should happen that there be one or more poorly clad or ragged children in the district, and public sentiment was opposed to the intermingling of such with the well-dressed youths of the district in the same school, “it would not be competent for the board of directors in their discretion to pander to such false public sentiment and to require the poorly clothed children to attend a separate school.” The Smith Case, 40 Iowa, 518, and the Dove Case, 41 Iowa, 689, also deal wholly with the right to exclude pupils because of their color. In Perkins v. Independent School Dist. 56 Iowa, 476, 9 N. W. 356, what is in effect condemned, is a rule which would exclude a pupil because damages for breaking a window were not paid. It is held that breaking a window glass by accident and without evil purpose will not warrant exclusion, and said that “Plaintiff was expelled, not because he broke the glass, but because he did not pay the damage sustained by the breaking. His default in this respect was no breach of good order or good morals. The rule requiring him to make payment is not intended to secure good order, but to enforce an obligation to pay a sum of money.”

The statute does not deny the equal protection of the law by making an arbitrary differentiation, even if a statute had no better standing than a mere rule. But it has. Unlike a mere administrative board, the legislature is clothed with a large discretion in determining upon classification and making differentiations. “The power to classify is primarily in the legislature, that the courts accord it the widest latitude in performing this function, and that a classification adopted by it will be sustained unless it is so palpably arbitrary as that there is no room for doubt that discretion has been abused by indulging in an unjustifiable discrimination.” Hunter v. Colfax Consol. Coal Co. 175 Iowa, 288, L.R.A.1917D, 15, 154 N. W. 1053, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 803, 11 N. C. C. A. 886. The courts do not and should not readily find that the legislature abused this discretion, and the statute should not be set aside by the judiciary unless “it is unmistakably and palpably in excess of the legislative powers.” McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S. 539, 547, 53 L. ed. 315, 2 Sup. Ct. Rep. 206. These statutes are clearly within that discretion.

IV. We take it that what is really complained of is not so much arbitrary classification or differentiation, but that the requirements of the statute work an arbitrary and capricious destruction of personal rights secured by fundamental law by means of exercising an utterly unjustified paternalism. Of course, there are limitations upon the power of the legislature to abrogate personal rights. But the courts will not annul a statute unless the interference is beyond reasonable doubt purely fanciful and arbitrary. Mathison v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. 126 Minn. 286, L.R.A. 1916D, 412, 148 N. W. 71, 5 N. C. C. A. 871; Sexton v. Newark Dist. Teleg. Co. 84 N. J. L. 85, 86 Atl. 451, 3 N. C. C. A. 569. The judicial arm will not interfere "unless the regulations are so utterly unreasonable and extravagant in their nature and purpose that the property and personal rights of the citizen are unnecessarily and in a manner wholly arbitrary, interfered with or destroyed without due process of law." Gundling's Case, 177 U. S. 183, 44 L. ed. 725, 20 Sup. Ct. Rep. 633. As to tax laws, it has been held that they will not be annulled "if there be the least possibility that making the gift will be promotive in any degree of the public welfare." Booth v. Woodbury, 32 Conn. 118, 128. To like effect is Brodhead v. Milwaukee, 19 Wis. 658, 668, 88 Am. Dec. 711; Sharpless v. Philadelphia, 21 Pa. 147, 174, 59 Am. Dec. 759; Cunningham's Case, 44 Mont. 180, 119 Pac. 554, 1 N. C. C. A. 720. Even as the legislature has a large discretion in making classes, it has it in determining what is for the public welfare; and that discretion has sustained exercises of paternalism in infinite variety. See McGuire v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. 131 Iowa, 360, 33 L.R.A.(N.S.) 706, 108 N. W. 902. It is a fair summary of the case law that no statute is violative of the Constitution if it have for its legitimate object anything that may fairly be said to be for the good of the state or promotive of good order, good morals, or the education of the citizen. Giozza v. Tiernan, 148 U. S. 662, 37 L. ed. 601, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 721. That the legislature may be paternal is not open to doubt in this day. The question is whether the statutes in consideration are an unwarranted paternalistic regulation. Their purpose is manifest. They declare that affiliations of pupils with certain associations should be restricted, and have the approval of the school authorities, because in the judgment of the legislature the privilege of the membership in a public school will be or may be made less valuable if such affiliations are not restricted. It is one of many attempts to check youth in wasting its assets, and to keep what the state bestows at its highest efficiency. It is directed against what is matter of common knowledge,—that activity in matters other than the school work will divide the interest of the pupil and subtract from the work that should be devoted to the school curriculum; and that affiliation with a society, no matter how innocent in itself, still has a tendency to breed hatreds and jealousies, because this society may exclude some while receiving others; that the tendency of such affiliations is to breed division and class hatred. If the state may compel the solvent bank to help pay losses sustained by depositors in insolvent banks; if it may enact workmen's compensation laws in order that the workman shall have no strained relations with his employer nor become embittered towards society because, though an industry has crippled him, it has paid him nothing; if acts aiming to make better citizens by diminishing the chances of pauperism are sustained; if it is competent for the state to protect the minor from impoverishing himself by contract,—it surely is not an arbitrary exercise of the functions of the state to insist upon methods that will tend to prevent the educational privileges furnished by the state from being in any degree wasted. We hold that these statutes are not unduly paternalistic, and that it is their ultimate object to raise the school privilege to its highest possible efficiency.

There is nothing in State ex rel. Stallard, v. White, 82 Ind. 287, 42 Am. Rep. 496, which in the least militates against our conclusion that these statutes are a proper regulation. The case involves a consideration of a board rule. It distinguishes between the right to compel renunciation of a society already affiliated with as a condition to entering a school, and the control of the pupil after he has once entered. Even as to a rule the case expressly holds that, after the status of the pupil is established, such rules as this statute makes are valid. While Kinzer v. Independent School Dist. (Kinzer v. Toms) 129 Iowa, 441, 3 L.R.A.(N.S.) 496, 105 N. W. 686, 6 Ann Cas. 996, uses some broad language which would be fairly controlling if undue paternalism were indulged in, the decision itself is against the appellants, and it upholds a football playing regulation made by rule only because of the general discretion lodged in boards of directors.

The case of University of Mississippi v. Waugh, 105 Miss. 623, L.R.A.1915D, 588, 62 So. 827, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 522, and the consideration of that case in the Supreme Court of the United States (237 U. S. 589, 59 L. ed. 1131, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 720), rule every material point in this appeal against the appellants; and we cannot agree that there is any difference in facts exhibited which makes these decisions inapplicable here. It is said that the writer who spoke for the Mississippi supreme court in the Waugh Case also spoke for that court in Hobbs v. Germany, 94 Miss. 469, 22 L.R.A. (N.S.) 983, 49 So. 515, and that the holding in the last case is such as that the opinion in the Waugh Case cannot mean what it plainly says. The sum of such contention is that the Hobbs Case is in conflict with the Waugh Case. We might follow the Waugh Case rather than the Hobbs Case if the two did conflict. But it is a sufficient answer that the two cases are not in conflict. The Waugh Case holds that the state has power to regulate affiliation with certain fraternities. The Hobbs Case holds that, if the school officers act beyond their power and in violation of law, the courts may interfere, even though the statute provides for an appeal to a county superintendent.

V. We decline to go extensively into the question of what some school boards might do under statutes such as these. We do not care to dwell at length upon the claim that affiliation with religious societies might be interfered with upon a liberal reading and enforcement of these statutes. It is not amiss to say that the Constitution guarantees religious liberty and that we may assume the legislature did not intend by these statutes to override that constitutional guaranty. Neither is it amiss to add we are not prepared to hold that the school authorities can in no manner regulate the activities of pupils in associations whose object it is to advance religion. See Donahoe v. Richards, 38 Me. 376. It will be time enough for us to determine whether these statutes have unduly interfered with religious liberty when someone affected shall complain that affiliation with some society for the promotion of religion is being interfered with. The courts are, and should be, reluctant to declare a law unconstitutional. From this it has followed that they will not consider a constitutional challenge unless the case cannot be decided without considering it. The application of this rule might well operate to deny these appellants the right to be heard at all. For all we know, there might have been no constitutional question to present had appellants asked the sanction of the school authority. Had the sanction been given, there would have been no suit. We do not mean to say that one may not urge a statute is unconstitutional without first doing what such statute might require. If this statute demanded that the applicant for permission to affiliate should pay $10,000 into the school fund, such a statute would be void, and could be attacked, though payment of the fee would make attack needless. But there is nothing unconstitutional about requiring an application for permission to join a society. And if the courts, instead of hunting opportunities to declare statutes void, seek in every reasonable way to avoid the necessity for pronouncing upon their validity, no good reason is perceivable why they may not decline to interpret the Constitution for suitors who have hunted, instead of attempted to avoid, a controversy over the Constitution,—who are before the court only because they refused to do what if done might have made it unnecessary for them to ask the courts to construe the Constitution.

VI. The rule adopts the words of the statute. It adds that the principal shall report to the board the names of all students who according to the judgment of the board in any way violate said statute provision; that the board shall, through its proper officers, notify the parents or guardians of all such pupils, calling attention to the supposed violation of such law; that, if within a reasonable time a satisfactory explanation is not given to the board, the superintendent and principal shall suspend any pupils guilty of violating any of the provisions of the statute. Since the rule is substantially nothing more than re-enactment of the statute and the creation of perfectly natural methods for performing the duties placed upon the board by the statute, and since the statute itself is valid, the rule cannot be invalid for being either unreasonable or in excess of statute authority. The only remaining contention is that no provision is made for a hearing, and that therefore there is a denial of due process of law. There is a provision for notifying the parents and guardians and for action if no satisfactory explanation be made. We think this is sufficient to save the rule against objection that it works a denial of due process. See Buttfield v. Stranahan, 192 U. S. 470, 48 L. ed. 525, 24 Sup. Ct. Rep. 349; Cunningham's Case, 44 Mont. 180, 119 Pac. 554, 555, 1 N. C. C. A. 720; *State Sav. & Commercial Bank v. We are of opinion that the judgment below should be, and it is, affirmed.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

v.

FRED L. CLOSSON.

(— Mass. —, 118 N. E. 653.)

Municipal corporations — traffic ordinance — criminal intent.

1. Criminal intent is not necessary to conviction for violation of a traffic ordinance. For other cases, see Criminal Law, I. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

United States — mail carrier — state regulation — violation — liability.

2. One in charge of a vehicle transporting United States mail is not exempt from the operation of state statutes and municipal ordinances regulating traffic on the highways, although by Federal statutes the highways are post roads.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, III. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(February 25, 1918.)

EXCEPTIONS by defendant to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County made during the trial of a complaint charging him with violations of certain traffic rules and regulations, which resulted in his conviction. Overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Frederick T. Conley for defendant.

Mr. A. C. Webber, for the Commonwealth:

The grant of power to the general government by article 1, § 8, of the Constitution of the United States, permitting the establishment of postoffices and post roads, and the regulation of foreign and interstate commerce, created only a special jurisdiction of the Federal government in state highways, general jurisdiction remaining with the states, subject, however, to such regulations as Congress may make in the exercise of its admitted powers.

Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Carlinville, 200 Ill. 314, 60 L.R.A. 391, 93 Am. St. Rep. 190, 65 N. E. 730; Weyl v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 40 Minn. 350, 42 N. W. 24.

The establishing of post roads was not intended to be an act derogatory to the sovereignty of a state, or to divest the state of its title to these roads. It was merely intended that the general government should have the right of transit over these roads for the purpose of carrying the mails.

This grant did not even exempt the business of the postoffice from paying tolls on toll roads and turnpikes.

The act of Congress forbidding the obstruction of the transmission of the mail was intended to establish a penal offense, and was not an assertion by the general government of a paramount right over the highways of a state to the exclusion of all local regulations over the same, so as to create a privilege or immunity on behalf of Federal employees from the effect of these regulations.

Braley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant does not contend that the rules and regulations of the respective commissioners of parks and of streets had not been duly promulgated, or were not in force at the time stated in the complaints, or that he did not violate those rules which require the driver of vehicles to keep to the right-hand side of the way, and when passing on his left to an intersecting street he must before turning proceed to the right until beyond the center of the intersecting street. It is immaterial that he was not actuated by any criminal intent. In prosecutions for misdemeanors created by statute under the exercise of the police power, proof of a guilty mind or corrupt purpose is not essential to a conviction. Com. v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 202 Mass. 394, 28 L.R.A. (N.S.) 350, 132 Am. St. Rep. 507, 88 N. E. 764, 16 Ann. Cas. 587. But by the plea to the jurisdiction, requests for rulings, and exceptions to a portion of the instructions, his defense rests upon the ground that, being employed as a mail carrier using a vehicle for the delivery of mail, he is immune from prosecution and punishment. The designated streets or ways are not, however, instrumentalities created by the general government, where "exemption from state control is essential to the independent sovereign authority of the United States within the sphere of their delegated powers." If they were, the defendant has committed no offense. Com. v. Clary, 8 Mass. 72; Newcomb v. Rockport, 183 Mass. 74, 76, 78, 66 N. E. 587. While undoubtedly they are post roads under Act of Congress, March 1, 1884, chap. 9, enacting that "all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post routes" (23 Stat. at L. 3, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 7457), and whoever knowingly and wilfully obstructs or retards "the passage of the mail, or any carriage, . . . driver, or carrier, . . ." is upon conviction subject to fine or imprisonment, or both, by U. S. Rev. Stat. § 3995, Act of March 4, 1909, chap. 321, § 201, 35 Stat. at L. 1127, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 10,371, yet the ways remain public ways laid out and maintained by the commonwealth, which has the exclusive power not only of alteration and of discontinuance, but to make and enforce reasonable regulations for their use. Nor do the facilities thereby afforded for transportation of the mails confer extraordinary rights upon mail carriers to use the ways as they please, or necessarily or impliedly do away with the power of supervision and control inherent in the state. Com. v. Breakwater Co. 214 Mass. 10, 100 N. E. 1034; Postal Teleg. Cable Co. v. Chicopee, 207 Mass. 341, 350, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 997, 93 N. Cas. 87. The use of the streets by travelers of every description is not prohibited. It is only the mode of operation by drivers of vehicles which is regulated, and, being reasonable, because well adapted for the security and protection of all travelers, the rules are constitutional, and their violation is punishable as a criminal offense. Com. v. Kingsbury, 199 Mass. 542, L.R.A.1915E, 264, 127 Am. St. Rep. 513, 85 N. E. 848; Com. v. Maletsky, 203 Mass. 241, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1168, 89 N. E. 245; Com. v. Feeney, 221 Mass. 323, 108 N. ### Annotation—State or municipal regulations affecting those engaged in handling United States mail.

The question raised by the subject of this note, especially as argued and decided in Com. v. Closson, ante, 939, involves the broader question of conflict between the authority of the United States government and that of state and local officials over post roads with special reference to the act of Congress which provides that "all public roads and highways, while kept up and maintained as such, are hereby declared to be post routes." The other acts quoted by the court merely impose a penalty for the wilful obstruction of the post roads.

In this broader aspect, two questions at once arise: (1) What power has Congress over post roads that are public highways within a state, under the constitutional provision for establishing postoffices and post roads? (2) To what extent has Congress, by the acts mentioned, attempted to supplant the power of the states in regulating traffic upon such roads? Neither of these two questions is within the scope of the present annotation except to the extent that regulations affecting those handling mails are concerned, and the note does not purport to be exhaustive on L.R.A.1918C.

any phase of the questions not within its scope.

In Dickey v. Maysville, W. P. & L. Turnp. Road Co. (1830) 7 Dana (Ky.) 113, the court, in holding that the owners of a toll road operated under a state franchise have the right to exact, from one using the road in carrying the United States mail under contract, payment of the same amount of toll as it charged others for the use of the road, gave a very elaborate and interesting discussion of the first question above stated; i. e., the power of Congress under the clause in question. Among other things it said: "Can the carrier of the United States mail have a right, either legal or moral, to use the bridge of a private person or of an incorporated company without paying pontage, or the ferry of a grantee of such franchise without paying ferriage? That he would have no such right is, in our judgment, indisputable. And the denial of such an unjust and anomalous pretention is not at all inconsistent with the proper supremacy of the general government in the exercise of its necessary power to transport the mail as cheaply, speedily, and certainly as possible, and when and where Congress shall have prescribed and had authority to prescribe. The power delegated to the general government over the mail cannot be greater than that which each state once possessed within its own borders; and had the people of the states never delegated any such power to Congress, the state of Kentucky, in all the plenitude of her power, upon that hypothesis, would surely have no right to use the Lexington and Maysville turnpike as a post road without paying a just equivalent to the company; for the Constitution of Kentucky, like that of the United States, provides that private property shall not be taken for public use without 'just compensation' to the owner, or without his consent; and, moreover, no state can, consistently with the Federal Constitution, pass any legislative act impairing the obligation of a contract; and not only is the turnpike stock private property, but the charter of the company is a contract, entitling the stockholders, for a valuable consideration, to prescribed tolls, of which the legislature could not deprive them without impairing the obligation of a solemn contract, and violating the plighted faith of Kentucky. There can, we think, be no doubt that the state had a perfect right to make such a contract, and, having made it, is certainly under a clear, moral, and political obligation to observe it scrupulously and in good faith. But if the Lexington and Maysville turnpike should be deemed in all respects a state road, and if the power to establish post roads should be understood as giving to Congress authority to designate and use, as a post road, any highway in a state without the consent of the state, nevertheless, such a power could not be understood as implying a right to use state roads upon any terms or in any manner the general government may choose to prescribe, or on better terms than those on which the people of the states themselves are permitted to use them in a similar manner. It certainly does not impose on any state the duty, either moral or political, of making or of repairing roads for post roads, but leaves them in the full possession of all the discretion they would otherwise have had to make such state roads, and to keep them in such repair as their own convenience and judgment alone may suggest. The people of the several states are under no constitutional obligation to make or repair roads for the use of the general government; nor can they be required to apply their own labor or money even to the keeping open of any one of their roads which shall have been designated as a post route; for, though a state highway once legally designated or established as a post route may continue de jure a post road as long as the act of Congress by which it was so designated or established shall remain unrepealed, yet certainly the state will not, therefore, be bound to continue it, but may discontinue it as a state road; and, consequently, if, after such discontinuance of any such state road, the general government choose still to use it as a post road, Congress must keep it open and in suitable condition by the application of national means. The people of a single state are not exclusively interested in the transportation of the national mails within and through their own commonwealth; the people of all the states are benefited by the proper and effectual transportation of intelligence through each state. And hence, the interest being thus common, and the power therefore national, the burden, and the responsibility also, should be, and undoubtedly are, equally national in each and every state. The right to judge, and the responsibility of judging, as to what roads and kind of roads the United States shall have for post roads, having been devolved on Congress, a state can neither exercise any controlling authority in that respect, nor be held responsible for any deficiency in any of the facilities necessary or proper for the most effectual transportation of the mails. A right of way, upon terms equal and common to all, is, in our opinion, the utmost privilege that can be implied by an authority to designate state roads as post routes. If one state should, at great expense, construct and preserve excellent roads, for the use of which it should exact a prescribed and reasonable toll sufficient for reparation, or even for indemnity for the cost, the people of other states, not choosing to provide such roads for themselves, would have no right to require or expect that the public mails, in which they are all interested as a national concern, should be transported in carriages, or otherwise, upon those costly and superior roads, without any contribution from the national purse for such national use, and for the wear and deterioration necessarily resulting from it. If Congress, representing the interests and wills of the people of all the states, shall fail or refuse to make any appropriation for constructing or repairing, or for aiding the construction or reparation of, good roads in a state, the general government would, as it seems to us, have no pretense for claiming for the Federal public any exclusive privileges in using such roads as post routes, or any exemption from the burden common to every individual of the local public, whose labor and money alone made and must preserve them. It appears to us that permission to the general government to use state roads as the state and its own citizens use them, and on the same terms, should be considered a boon rather than a burden,—a valuable privilege rather than an unjust or unauthorized exaction."

Whether the term "post routes" is synonymous with "post roads" seems to depend upon the context of the statute in which the terms are used. Railway Mail Service Cases (1877) 13 Ct. Cl. (Fed.) 199. The context of the Act of 1884, above quoted, seems to indicate that Congress intended "post routes" to mean the same as "post roads," wherever they are used as such. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hopkins (1911) 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557.

This is the sense in which the term is used in some other acts of Congress, although not in all statutes. Blackham v. Gresham (1883) 21 Blatchf. 354, 16 Fed. 609; United States v. Easson (1883) 18 Fed. 590.

And under this act all the streets of a city are post roads, because they are letter carriers' routes. Western U. Teleg. Co. v. New York (1889) 3 L.R.A. 449, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 533, 38 Fed. 553; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hopkins (1911) 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557.

The act in question does not authorize a telegraph company to construct its lines over the right of way of a railroad company without making compensation therefor. Atlantic & P. Teleg. Co. v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1874) 6 Biss. 158, Fed. Cas. No. 632. The court said: "The authority to do this is claimed to exist under various acts of Congress, some of which declare all railroads in the United States to be post routes. By these acts understand nothing more is meant than that the mails can be transported over railroads, as over ordinary public highways, with all those securities and safeguards thrown around the transit of the mails by various congressional enactments. It does not necessarily follow that because railroads are thus declared post routes [Act of Congress 1872, Rev. Stat. § 3064, L.R.A. 1918C, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 7456], the United States can therefore, without the consent of the railroad companies, and without compensation, transport the mails over them."

In Cleveland, P. & A. R. Co. v. Franklin Canal Co. (1853) Fed. Cas. No. 2890, the court said: "But the complainants allege that they are entitled to an injunction on another ground. They are contractors for carrying the mail of the United States over the road they have made, in railroad cars, from Cleveland to Erie, and from thence back to Cleveland; and by an act of Congress this road has been made a post road. The power given by the Constitution to establish post roads has always been construed to mean, and as I think rightly, such roads as were regularly laid out by authority of the states, or by counties under the laws of the states. The government of the United States cannot construct a post road within a state of this Union without its consent; but Congress may declare, that is, establish, such a road already opened and made a public highway by the direct or indirect authority of the state. The post roads of the United States are the property of the states through which they pass; they may temporarily part with the possession of them by charter, and the grantees, while the charter continues, have the right to preserve such roads and prevent their threatened destruction. The United States has the mere right of transit over these roads for the purpose of carrying the mail, and in case of obstructing this right their laws provide an adequate remedy. The government itself could not obtain the injunction applied for to prevent the destruction of a mail road; the right to do so follows the right of property or possession; a mail contractor and any other person may have a right of action for damages in the courts of the state for an obstruction to a mail road, or the wrongdoer there may be punished by indictment, but no injunction can legally issue upon an application to restrain a threatened injury to the road. This power must always be exercised with great caution; to allow it in a case like this would be an alarming extension of jurisdiction, open to great abuses, and extending over many thousands of miles, and to persons who as mail contractors have no interest in the roads they pass over. The act of Congress making all railroads post roads, means only such as have charters from the several states; it is not to be inferred that they intended to do anything in derogation of the sovereignty of a state, by declaring that to be a post road which was the work of an individual or of a company for his or their profit, without law, or it may be in opposition to law."

In Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Richmond (1909) 178 Fed. 310, affirmed in (1912) 224 U. S. 160, 56 L. ed. 710, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 449, where it was held that a telegraph company can, under an act of Congress authorizing such companies to erect poles on all post roads, erect and maintain poles upon the public streets of a city without the consent of the local authorities, but that in doing so it must conform to all reasonable regulations made by the city, the court said: "The object sought to be obtained, the benefits intended to be secured to the government of the United States, through the regulation of the business mentioned, and the facilities for communication between its departments in distant sections of the nation, would be jeopardized, if not destroyed, by the antagonistic interests likely to be found in different localities, if the officials thereof possessed the power to determine when and how the right granted by the Federal government should become operative. Such companies, under the legislation of the Congress, have the right to use the post roads of the United States in conducting their business; but such use is subject to the police power of the localities where they so operate, which, properly exercised by state and municipal authority, must be respected be complainant and by all companies similarly situated. The rules and regulations promulgated by such authority must be reasonable, should be free from local prejudice or favoritism, and enacted in an honest endeavor to best subserve existing rights and conditions. It is the duty of the local authorities to see that the safety and the interests of the communities where such companies are located are protected, and that for the use of the property of the public such compensation is paid as will at least keep in good repair the streets, alleys, and post roads that are intended for the enjoyment of all alike. As a matter of course, all such companies are subject to taxation on their property in the same manner and to the same extent as are the other companies and citizens generally of the sections where the property is situated. They must contribute their due proportion to the expenses of the local governments, the benefits of which they enjoy, and whose protection they are entitled to."

And it was held in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Hopkins (1911) 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557, that, under the statutes mentioned in the preceding cases, a state could charge and receive, from a telegraph company operating under the Federal authority, compensation for the use by it of so much of the street or highway as it exclusively appropriates, but that it has no right to compel it to accept a franchise from the state and then tax that franchise. The court said: "The question of the extent and character of the rights granted by the Federal act is, of course, exclusively a Federal question, upon which the decisions of the United States Supreme Court are necessarily final. There is apparently considerable difference in the views of learned counsel appearing in this case, and also in the views of different judges, both Federal and state, as to the effect of various decisions of the United States Supreme Court touching this question. But we think there can reasonably be no difference of opinion as to the meaning of those decisions so far as all questions necessary to the determination of this case are concerned. It was clearly and definitely established by the decision of that court in St. Louis v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1893) 148 U. S. 92, 37 L. ed. 380, 13 Sup. Ct. Rep. 485, that the privilege conferred by the Act of July 24, 1866, on telegraph companies, to construct, maintain, and operate lines of telegraph over such post roads as are public streets or highways of a state, is subject to the right of the state to charge and receive compensation from the telegraph company for the use by it of so much of the street or highway as is exclusively devoted to its purposes."

As already indicated, this annotation does not purport to contain an exhaustive list of cases dealing with the general questions stated, nor is it exhaustive on the particular question raised in any of the cases above cited. However, from the general trend of the decisions cited and the basic principles underlying them, it seems clear that the court in Com. v. Closson, ante, 939, was correct in its holding that a mail carrier is not, because of his work in handling United States mail, entitled to disregard the reasonable traffic regulations established by the municipality over whose streets he travels in this performance of his duties, although there is no other reported case in which that particular question was decided.

An analogous question was before the court in Ex parte Marshall, infra, where it was held that a city has power to exact the customary reasonable license fees from a taxicab owner using the streets of the city in conveying United States soldiers, for pay from the soldiers, to and from a military camp outside the city, under a contract with the commandant in charge of the camp granting a monopoly of the soldier trade, and requiring that the automobiles be run on schedules and that the fare be reasonable, and imposing other regulations.

The power to compel stoppage of mail trains is considered in the notes in 14 L.R.A.(N.S.) 293, and 29 L.R.A.(N.S.) 159; and as to interstate trains, see those notes and the note in 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 478, and later cases, State ex rel. Caster v. Dickinson, L.R.A. 1918B, 534, and Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Texas, ante, 535. J. W. M.

FLORIDA SUPREME COURT.

EX PARTE A. C. MARSHALL.

(— Fla. —, 77 So. 869.)

License — motor vehicles — line to army camp.

Where a partnership composed of individuals residing in the city of Jacksonville are engaged in, and presumably licensed to do, a general business of running autobusses and other motor-driven vehicles for hire over the streets and public highways in and around said city, who, as an incident of their general business of petro-motor carriers, enter into a side contract with the commanding officer of a military encampment of United States soldiers located within a few miles of said city, by which they acquire a monopoly of conveying such military officers and soldiers back and forth between such city and such encampment at a reduced fare paid by each individual soldier carried, and by which they agree to observe such rules and regulations in the operation of such vehicles as are prescribed in such contract, under penalty only of forfeiture of such contract for noncompliance therewith, such motor vehicles or their operation not being under military control, and the United States not having any interest or ownership therein or control thereover,—under these circumstances, held that such contract was not the grant of such a franchise as will exempt such partnership from the payment of the license tax imposed by the state, county, or municipality for conducting the business of petro-motor carriers for hire; and held, further, that such partnership was not exempt from, but was liable for, the payment of such licenses.

Messrs. Kay, Adams, & Ragland, for petitioner:

The franchise or privilege granted to petitioner by the commanding officer at Camp Johnston constitutes a franchise and privilege granted by the military branch of the United States government, and is not subject to the license tax imposed by the ordinance or state statute.

Taylor, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The petitioner, A. C. Marshall, by his petition for the writ of habeas corpus filed here, seeks relief from arrest by the chief of police of the city of Jacksonville under a warrant based on an affidavit charging him with operating an autobus with a seating capacity of twelve persons on a public street of said city without having paid the license tax of $50 required by a municipality to enforce its traffic regulations against mail carriers upon its streets that have been declared to be post roads. See annotation following that case.

Ordinance No. C—4 of said city, approved August 13, 1917.

The petition alleges that on November 21, 1917, your petitioner as manager of Orange Belt Auto Line, a copartnership composed of himself and K. C. McCulloch, obtained from Fred L. Munson, Lieutenant Colonel Quartermaster Corps, the commanding officer of the quartermaster camp located at Camp Johnston, near Jacksonville, Florida, a franchise and permit to maintain a satisfactory autobus service between said city and said camp, the same being granted in consideration of certain enumerated conditions and regulations therein prescribed by the said commanding officer with reference to the character of equipment, character of service, precautions to be observed, route to be traversed, fares to be charged, etc., all of which will more fully appear by a copy of said franchise hereto attached, marked Exhibit C, as follows:

Headquarters Camp Joseph E. Johnston,
Jacksonville, Florida.

#004x500 November 21, 1917.

Mr. A. C. Marshall, Manager Orange Belt
Auto Line,

Jacksonville, Florida.

Dear Sir:—

This is to certify that you are authorized to maintain a satisfactory autobus service between the city of Jacksonville and Camp Joseph E. Johnston, Florida.

That in consideration of this privilege, you have agreed in writing to abide by the following enumerated conditions, viz.:

(a) To run only first-class cars driven by competent and reliable chauffeurs.

(b) That during the construction of the camp you will cause your chauffeurs to drive slowly and carefully through the congested streets of the camp, and that your cars will in no way interfere with the working traffic of the constructing quartermaster or of his building contractors.

(c) That you, personally, will be held liable for any injury to persons or animals or to damage caused other vehicles that may become injured or damaged on the camp reservation through the faulty or careless driving of any of your chauffeurs.

(d) That the termini of the route will be the vicinity of the Mason Hotel, corner Julia and Bay streets, Jacksonville, Florida, and the clubhouse at Camp Johnston.

(e) That the fare will not exceed 40 cents per one way trip, nor more than 75 cents per round trip.

(f) That so long as you abide by all of the above-named conditions, you will be authorized to continue your bus service for at least six months following the completion of the electric car line from Ortega to the camp.

(g) That a noncompliance with any or all of the said conditions may cause a forfeiture of the privilege of operating your bus service within the camp reservation.

Very truly yours,

[Signed] F. L. Munson,

Lt. Col. Q. M. Corps.

Indorsement:

I have carefully read the above letter and do hereby agree to comply with all of its requirements to the best of my ability.

[Signed] A. C. Marshall,

General Manager Orange Belt Auto Line.

That on December 24, 1917, pursuant to said franchise and permit, which was duly accepted by your petitioner as appears by the indorsement thereon, the said commanding officer promulgated General Order No. 33, prescribing further regulations under which said bus service shall be operated by petitioner and enjoyed by the officers and enlisted men of the United States government stationed at said camp, which order is as follows:

Headquarters Camp Joseph E. Johnston,
Jacksonville, Florida, December 24, 1917.
General Orders, No. 33:

1. A contract has been entered into between the commanding officer and the Orange Belt Auto Line, under the management of Mr. A. C. Marshall. All cars operating under the management of this company are marked "O. B. A. L. Govt. Controlled."

2. Under his contract Mr. Marshall guarantees to use only first-class equipment to be driven by competent and experienced chauffeurs. These chauffeurs will hold a certificate of service signed only by Mr. Marshall. The questions of speed and the overloading of cars are fully covered in the contract.

3. Every effort has been made by this office to safeguard the limbs and lives of all men of this command who may enter any car licensed to operate between the camp and the city of Jacksonville.

4. In view of the above all officers and enlisted men are warned against entering any car after the chauffeur thereof has informed them that there is no further room. The last man or men to enter a car after its authorized seating capacity has been reached are the offenders, and must at once leave said car upon being asked to do so by the chauffeur. It shall be the duty of any officer or noncommissioned officer who may be either inside or near a car, to order off and keep off any surplus passengers when appealed to for assistance by the chauffeur.

5. In case a car is overloaded and the offending man will not get off upon request by the chauffeur, said chauffeur has orders to hold his car at a standstill until the offender leaves said car.

6. Any chauffeur who allows his car to be overloaded, or who fails to stop at the gate upon being ordered to do so by the gate guard, or fails to obey the letter as well as the spirit of this order, will be excluded from entering this camp for a period of six (6) months, or his car will be excluded for same period, or both.

7. In order that all men of this camp may enjoy a fairly equal opportunity of getting accommodations in the various authorized busses, on and after the 25th instant, the starting point of one third of the busses will be from the junction of old brick road and Twelfth street, north of Y. M. C. A. No. 2; one third from junction of brick road and Sixth street; and one third from Hostess House (old clubhouse).

8. All cars starting from camp from these three points will be plainly marked "Twelfth Street," "Sixth Street," and "First Street," respectively. All cars so marked will deliver their passengers as far in the camp as said passengers desire to go, but all Sixth and Twelfth Street cars must arrive at their respective stations on the return trip to Jacksonville empty.

9. The Twelfth Street bus line is primarily intended for the accommodation of the troops living in blocks H, J, K, and L; Sixth Street line for blocks D, E, F, and G; and First Street line for Headquarters, Hostess House, and blocks A, B, and C.

10. A strict compliance with the terms of this order on the part of all concerned will result in better service, contentment, and safety.

By order of Lieut. Colonel Munson.

J. H. Spengler,

Captain Q. M., U. S. R., Adjutant.

That in addition to the regulations set forth in said original franchise of November 21, 1917, and in said General Order No. 33, the said commanding officer made other requirements and regulations of said bus service rendered by your petitioner; the aforesaid franchise, and the conditions under which the same were to be enjoyed by petitioner were fully confirmed and authorized by the said commanding officer; a copy of the said confirmation, together with petitioner's acceptance thereof, is attached to the petition, marked Exhibit E, as follows:

Headquarters Camp Joseph E. Johnston,
Jacksonville, Florida, January 5, 1918.
Mr. A. C. Marshall, Manager Orange Belt
Auto Line,
Jacksonville, Florida.

Dear Sir:—

I have deemed it advisable to confirm the privilege granted to you under date of November 21, 1917, for the maintenance of a bus service between the city of Jacksonville and Camp Joseph E. Johnston, pursuant to the modifications thereof ordered or authorized by me since the date of same, and to that end I hereby certify and confirm that you have been authorized by me to have the exclusive right and privilege to maintain a satisfactory autobus service between said city and said camp, as long as the service supplied by you over said route shall be adequate and satisfactory to me as commanding officer of said camp, subject to the following regulations and orders, and such further orders and regulations as may be made or authorized by me. That in consideration of said exclusive right and privilege, you have agreed in writing, and will agree by your acceptance hereof, to abide by the following enumerated conditions:

1. To run only first-class cars, driven by competent and reliable chauffeurs.

2. That you, personally, shall be held liable for any injury to officers and enlisted men, or government property that may become injured or damaged on said camp reservation, or upon any portion of the route hereinafter designated, through the faulty or careless driving of any of the chauffeurs operating cars owned by your auto line; and you shall also be personally liable for like injuries or damages arising under like circumstances, due to the faulty or careless driving of any of the chauffeurs operating all other cars which may come under your control, although owned by other parties, when engaged in said service.

3. That the termini of the route over which said bus service shall be maintained shall be the points at said camp heretofore designated in General Order No. 33, under date of December 24, 1917, and the vicinity of the Mason and Aragon Hotels, in the city of Jacksonville, Florida. That between said termini, said route shall traverse the public highways and public streets now existing between said camp and said termini in said city: Provided, however, that, upon special orders or requests from me or my staff officer detailed for that purpose, you may be required to divert cars to or from the Union Station in said city, when necessary to transport officers or enlisted men to or from said station.

4. That all cars operated by you in said service, whether owned by your auto line or under your control, shall be marked "O. B. A. L. Govt. Controlled," and each shall carry a designated number for the purpose of identification.

5. That you will cause all chauffeurs operating each and every of the cars under your management and control in said service, to drive slowly and carefully through the congested streets of said camp reservation, and shall require said chauffeurs to observe all reasonable traffic regulations over the entire route, as hereinbefore designated.

6. That the fares which you are authorized to charge officers and enlisted men when transported in autobusses between said camp and said city shall be 35 cents each way, and 25 cents each way between the end of the street car line at Ortega, Florida, and said camp; these rates to apply between the hours of 5 A. M. and 12 midnight; between 12 midnight and 5 A. M. the rates shall be 50 cents each way. The fares for officers and enlisted men when transported in touring cars between said camp and said city shall be 50 cents each way, irrespective of the hour. That the fare for civilians between said city and said camp shall be 50 cents each way, without regard to the hour or equipment. That until the construction of said camp shall be completed by A. Bentley & Sons Company, you will also be required to transport employees of said contractors for a fare of 35 cents each way, the transportation of such employees, however, to be subordinated to the transportation of the officers and enlisted men stationed in said camp. That as exceptions to the fares above provided, you will be required to transport free of charge provost guards detailed by my staff to police said highway and to perform police duty in said city, and in order to facilitate the aforesaid free transportation, you are authorized to issue free passes to said provost guards.

7. That all automobiles and autobusses placed in said service, either owned by your auto line or under your control, shall be devoted primarily to the transportation of officers and men between said camp and said city, the transportation of civilians to be subordinated to the needs of said officers and men, and the cars devoted to said service shall not, during the continuance of your privilege as aforesaid, be diverted to any other service without my consent or authorization.

8. That, as to the matter of schedules and details of the service, you will be governed L.R.A.1918C.

by the orders and directions of Captain C. Walcott, Q. M., U. S. R., a member of my staff, having in charge the transportation facilities to be rendered by you, and you will also be required to make said service conform to my General Order No. 33, under date of December 24, 1917, and such further orders as may from time to time be made by me with reference to said service.

9. That the equipment which you will be required to furnish shall be sufficient to meet the average daily demand for transportation between said camp and said city; it being recognized that the unusual demands upon holidays or other special occasions cannot be made the test of the adequacy of your equipment.

10. In order to enlarge the equipment of your auto line, you are authorized to make contracts with other parties, providing for the placing of their machines under your exclusive management and control, to be subject to the regulations hereinbefore mentioned, and as a consideration to you for the time and expense of supervising, and for the responsibility assumed by you in regard to injuries or damage to government men or property as aforesaid, you are authorized to require such other parties to pay you a percentage not exceeding 10 per cent of the gross receipts received from the operation of their respective cars in said service.

11. In the exercise and enjoyment of the exclusive privilege and right herein granted and confirmed to you, you will recognize that my reasons for granting you the same, among other things, are that I have found it essential to the morale of the officers and men stationed at said camp to permit them to visit said city on private business and for recreation, also to have said provost guards detailed for police duty in said city, to prevent said men, as far as possible, from participating in various forms of dissipation, and have further found it necessary to the morale of said officers and men to permit their relatives and friends to visit them at said camp, and have found it necessary also for myself and members of my staff to go to and from said city on official business of the United States government, for which purposes it was essential to provide a means of transportation between said camp and said city for the officers and enlisted men stationed there, as well as for civilians having occasion to visit said camp, there being no street car line to said camp and no other adequate means of transportation available; also that I was desirous of having the entire bus service rendered to said camp under one management, so that the responsibility for injuries or damage to government men or property would be definitely located and assumed by a responsible party; also that the greatest possible safety would be obtained to the officers, men, and government property affected by said service; and in view of these considerations, you will be expected to carefully observe the foregoing regulations and such others as may be from time to time duly authorized, and so long as you abide thereby, your exclusive privilege and right, as hereinbefore defined, shall continue. That a noncompliance with any or all of said conditions may cause a forfeiture of said right and privilege.

Yours very truly,

F. L. Munson,
Lieutenant Colonel, Q. M. Corps.

Indorsement:

I have carefully read the foregoing communication, and do hereby agree to comply with all its requirements to the best of my ability.

A. C. Marshall,
General Manager Orange Belt Auto Line.

That at the time of his arrest the alleged autobus mentioned in said warrant was being operated in said bus service under the authority and subject to the conditions and regulations of the said franchise of November 21, 1917, as also said subsequent regulations, and also subject to said confirmation of January 5, 1918, and not otherwise.

That the service rendered by your petitioner with each and every of the autobusses and automobiles employed in said service, including the aforesaid bus being operated at the time of his arrest, is a service constituting business of the United States government; that the said autobusses and automobiles employed in said service, as aforesaid, are instrumentalities engaged in the transaction of business for the military branch of the United States government, under the exclusive direction and control of said commanding officer, or such member of his staff as he may detail for that purpose. That under the franchise granted and confirmed to your petitioner as aforesaid, and subject to the rules, regulations, and conditions therein prescribed, your petitioner, in performing a part of said service with the aforesaid autobus, as well as some forty additional autobusses and automobiles now owned and controlled by your petitioner and engaged in said service, constituted an agency of the United States government. That the right to operate said bus line over said route, and to receive tolls therefrom in accordance with the rules, regulations, and conditions provided in the said franchise or confirmation L.R.A.1918C.

thereof, constituted a franchise of the Federal government, and is not subject to the license tax provided in said ordinance.

Many cases from the Supreme Court of the United States and other Federal and state courts are cited to support the contentions of the petitioner, such as Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204; California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827; San Francisco v. Western U. Teleg. Co. 96 Cal. 140, 17 L.R.A. 301, 31 Pac. 10; Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lakin, 53 Wash. 326, 101 Pac. 1094, 17 Ann. Cas. 718; Williams v. Talladega, 226 U. S. 404, 57 L. ed. 275, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 116; Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Harrison, 235 U. S. 292, 59 L. ed. 234, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 27. We are in accord with the holdings of all of these cases, except possibly some expressions used therein illustratum arguendo that may be classed as obiter dictum; but unfortunately for the petitioner none of them fit the facts of the case in hand. In all of them a license tax was sought to be imposed by a state, county, or municipality upon the right to do business either by a bank, a railroad company, or telegraph company that had been chartered, and had been granted its franchise and right to do business by the Congress of the United States, and in all of them it was held in effect that such license tax was invalid because it was an unwarranted invasion of rights properly granted by the Federal government, and amounted virtually to an attempt to annul such Federal grant. In the case of Choctaw, O. & G. R. Co. v. Harrison, supra, the state of Oklahoma undertook to impose an occupational tax upon the railroad company for the mining of coal that the railroad company, as lessee of the Federal government, had agreed to mine, the Federal government being under obligations by treaty contract with an Indian tribe to develop the mines from which it had been taken. The sum total of the decision in that case was that "a Federal instrumentality acting under congressional authority cannot be subjected to an occupation or privilege tax by a state." There the Federal government was itself under contract obligations to develop the mines owned by the Indians; it procured its lessee, the railroad company, to fulfil its obligations by mining, in its place and stead, the coal from said mines. To have permitted the imposition of the occupational tax sought to be made in that case would have been to impose such tax by a state directly upon the Federal government; that, of course, is impossible. No such facts governing the decisions in any of the cited cases exist in the case in hand. It is insisted by the petitioner that he is operating his automobiles and autobusses on the streets of the city of Jacksonville under and by virtue of a "franchise" granted to him by the commanding officer of a military camp located a few miles from said city, by which he is granted the right to convey the United States soldiers there quartered back and forth between said city and said camp on business or recreation bent. We have examined carefully the documents quoted above that are urged here as being a "franchise" to do the business of an autobus line in this state, the county of Duval, and the municipality of Jacksonville, but we fail to find in any of them any feature or semblance of the grant of a franchise to conduct such business. Even if it be conceded that an army officer has any lawful authority to grant any such "franchise" in a state where he and the troops under him may be quartered, there is in the documents put forward here as constituting such franchise no attempt at any such grant. We grant that, if the exigencies of a state of war should demand it, a commanding officer of an army may commandeer, seize, and utilize privately owned autobusses on the streets or other highways in the transportation of troops and all the other paraphernalia of war, and may do this without payment of any taxes for the operation thereof on the public highways; but when it is asserted that he can go into a state not under martial law, and there grant franchises to any of its citizens generally to conduct any class of business enterprise within the civil jurisdiction of such state, we very strongly doubt the asserted authority.

But in the documents put forward here as being a franchise there is no attempt at the grant of any such franchise, but on their face they are nothing more than a voluntary contract between a partnership of individuals conducting a general business of carrying passengers and their baggage by autobusses and automobiles to and from points in and around the city of Jacksonville on the one part, and the commanding officer of a United States encampment of soldiers on the other part, by which, in consideration of the furnishing of good auto vehicles with skilled and careful drivers, and of a reduction in the fares to soldiers per man conveyed, and of the observance of certain regulations prescribed as to stopping places, and the giving of preference to soldier passengers over civilians, such commanding officer undertakes to give to said auto partnership a monopoly over all other organized bus lines and automobiles for hire of the right of entrance into said camp grounds and of conveying therefrom the soldiers there encamped. Each soldier individually pays his own fares for being carried back and forth, and the only penalty fixed in the contract for any nonobservance of its terms is not a military arrest or other military punishment, but simply a forfeiture of the rights acquired by such contract. The case presented is simply of a firm of individuals residing in Jacksonville engaged in and presumably licensed to do a general business of running autobusses and automobiles for hire over the streets of said city, who, as an incident of their general business, make a side contract, so to speak, with an officer in command of an encampment of United States soldiers, by which they acquire a monopoly of conveying such soldiers back and forth to and from such camp, and by which, for a consideration individually paid by each soldier who becomes a passenger on their line, they agree to convey such soldiers back and forth between said city and said camp; the government of the United States having no interest in or ownership over any of the autos used. Under these circumstances, we do not think that the petitioner is exempt from the payment of his license tax, and the writ of habeas corpus is therefore hereby denied.

Whitfield, Ellis, and West, JJ., concur.

Browne, Ch. J., dissenting:

The several orders of Lieutenant Colonel Munson, whereby he granted to the petitioner the privilege or franchise to operate the bus line between Camp Joseph E. Johnston and the city of Jacksonville, are set out in full in the opinion of the court. I will, however, quote from the eleventh paragraph of the confirmation of the "privilege" granted to petitioner, which contains some of the reasons for the order:

"11. In the exercise and enjoyment of the exclusive privilege and right herein granted and confirmed to you, you will recognize that my reasons for granting you the same, among other things, are that I have found it essential to the morale of the officers and men stationed at said camp to permit them to visit said city on private business and for recreation, also to have said provost guards detailed for police duty in said city, to prevent said men, as far as possible, from participating in various forms of dissipation, and have further found it necessary to the morale of said officers and men to permit their relatives and friends to visit them at said camp, and have found it necessary also for myself and members of my staff to go to and from said city on official business of the United States government, for which purposes it was essential to provide a means of transportation between said camp and said city for the officers and enlisted men stationed there, as well as for civilians having occasion to visit said camp, there being no street car line to said camp and no other adequate means of transportation available; also that I was desirous of having the entire bus service rendered to said camp under one management, so that the responsibility for injuries or damage to government men or property would be definitely located and assumed by a responsible party; also that the greatest possible safety would be obtained to the officers, men, and government property affected by said service."

The precise question involved in this case has never been determined by the Federal courts, but from the doctrines enunciated in cases involving analogous questions, and from the trend of recent decisions, and from the spirit of the times, I have an abiding conviction that wherever the question of the power of a state court to nullify or to review an order made by a military commander in time of war, whereby he contracts for the performance of any service which he considers essential to the morale and safety of the officers and soldiers under his command, it will be determined against such power being exercised by the state courts.

When a nation is at war, its rulers must necessarily be clothed with autocratic and absolute power; less than this may result in failure to accomplish the purpose of the war, if not in defeat and disaster. Neither can the people demand all their constitutional rights, for all rights must be subordinate to and submerged in the great object of winning the war.

The people having elected to engage in a foreign war, they must be prepared to sacrifice their lives, their fortunes, their peace ideals, and even their constitutional rights, if need be, to gain an overwhelming victory.

The military arm of the government must not be hampered by local laws, ordinances, or regulations. The commanding officer of a military camp is charged with the duty of maintaining the morale of his men and providing for their safety and comfort, and for any dereliction of his duty in these respects he is answerable to military authority. When he promulgates an order, rule, or regulation, wherein, as in this case, he states that he does so because it is "essential to the morale of the officers and men stationed at said camp," and "that the greatest possible safety would be obtained to the officers, men, and government property affected by the service," neither a city nor a state has any authority to nullify the effect of his orders by requiring the agencies which he establishes or instrumentalities which he uses for the accomplishment of his ends to pay a license tax for the privilege of performing the duties which he charges them with.

The power to require the payment of an occupational license tax carries with it the power to impose so great a tax as to amount to a prohibition, and it is quite clear that when the military authorities in time of war consider certain services which are to be performed by another necessary for the morale and safety of the Army, such services cannot be crippled, hampered, or prevented by the exercise of the licensing power of the state. If the services which the commanding officer of Camp Joseph E. Johnston considers essential for the morale and safety of his men are not in fact necessary, it is a matter for the national authorities to determine, and is not subject to review by the state courts, and we cannot controvert his declaration that the auto service which he has established between the camp and the city of Jacksonville is essential to the purposes stated in General Order No. 33, and the amplification and confirmation thereof made by him on January 5, 1918. If he has no authority under military regulations in time of war to grant the franchise to the defendant, his act is subject to review and disapproval by the military arm of the nation, and not by the state authorities, and as long as his order remains uncountermanded by the national authorities, its validity must be respected and given full recognition and obedience.

What the President himself as Commander in Chief of the Army may do attaches to the officer in charge of the military forces at Camp Johnston. As was said by the court in Ex parte Vallandigham. Fed. Cas. No. 16,816: "The only reason why the appointment is made is that the President cannot discharge the duties in person. He therefore constitutes an agent to represent him, clothed with the necessary power for the efficient supervision of the military interests of the government throughout the department, and it is not necessary that martial law should be proclaimed or exist to enable the general in command to perform the duties assigned him."

The last portion of this citation meets the reference in the opinion of this court that this state is not under martial law.

Discussing the power of the courts to annul or reverse the action of a military commander in time of war, the court said: "He has done this under his responsibility as the commanding general of this department, and in accordance with what he supposed to be the power vested in him by the appointment of the President. It was virtually the act of the executive department under the power vested in the President by the Constitution; and I am unable to perceive on what principle a judicial tribunal can be invoked to annul or reverse it. In the judgment of the commanding general, the emergency required it, and whether he acted wisely or discreetly is not properly a subject for judicial review."

The reasons given by Judge Leavitt for holding that a Federal court has no power to annul or reverse an order of a commanding officer in time of war apply with greater force to the power of a state court.

It is contended that because the military authorities permit the petitioner to transport civilians to and from the camp, when the space in the busses is not wholly occupied by soldiers, he transcended his authority, and that ipso facto the instrumentality created by him for the benefit of his troops became subject to the operation of the state and city laws imposing occupational taxes on the petitioner. To concede this contention is to assert the authority of state courts to review, modify, or annul an order of a military commander in time of war, thus making the states the final arbiters of the wisdom, the necessity, or the reasonableness of a military order. It begs the question to say that the order under which the petitioner was performing the service for which he is being held by the state authorities was made by the commanding officer of a camp only, and not entitled to the dignity of a military order. The President of the United States advised Congress to "declare the recent course of the Imperial German Government to be in fact nothing less than war against the United States," and Congress promptly acted on his advice and provided for raising an army to carry on the war. The duty of organizing, equipping, arming, training, disciplining this huge military machine, is the result of congressional action, and it devolved upon the President of the United States as Commander in Chief of the Army to carry it into effect, and through and by him this authority descends until it reaches the commanding officers of camps established for the purpose of preparing the Army for war, and every order made by a military officer of a camp for the safety and morale of his officers and men, until revoked or disapproved by his superior in command, is made by virtue of and under the authority of the Commander in Chief of the military forces of the United States. To say that the orders of the commanding officer of a camp whereby he creates agencies or instrumentalities for the benefit of the Army under his command can be nullified by a city ordinance imposing an occupational tax on a person to whom the commanding officer has given a franchise or privilege for what he believes to be essential for the morale and safety of his men is to strike at the Commander in Chief of the Army himself, under whose authority and command the officer is acting. When Lieutenant Colonel Munson granted to petitioner the privilege or franchise, which the imposition of this occupational tax would tend to impede, cripple, or destroy, he acted under the authority of Congress and for the President of the United States, as every official act of a military commander in time of war is the act of the Commander in Chief until disapproved or reviewed by him, or some other military authority acting under him.

It may be that Lieutenant Colonel Munson is mistaken when he says that it is necessary for the morale and safety of his men that civilians who have business at the camp or who desire to visit his officers and men may be transported in the busses of this transportation line, but such mistake, if it be one, is not reviewable by the state courts; nor does his mistaken view of its necessity subject to imprisonment by state authorities for nonpayment of an occupational tax the person who is performing the duty imposed upon him by such military order. The privilege granted to the petitioner by Colonel Munson in this instance is no less a franchise than one granted by Congress or any other department of the national government.

The Federal courts have passed on the question of the power of the states to destroy or abridge a franchise or privilege granted by the Federal authorities for national purposes by the imposition of taxes, and the doctrine laid down in these cases decided in time of peace apply with greater force in time of war.

Osborn v. Bank of United States, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. ed. 204, is one of the great cases in which Chief Justice Marshall wrote his views into the Constitution of the United States, and settled the question that a state had no power to tax an instrumentality of the Federal government, and the court illustrated its reasoning with a statement which is peculiarly applicable to this case: "Can a contractor for supplying a military post with provisions be restrained from making purchases within any state, or from transporting the provisions to the place at which the troops were stationed? or could he be fined or taxed for doing so? We have not yet heard these questions answered in the affirmative. It is true that the property of the contractor may be taxed as the property of other citizens; and so may the local property of the bank. But we do not admit that the act of purchasing, or of conveying the articles purchased, can be under state control."

Other cases which follow and extend the doctrine of Osgorn v. Bank of United States, supra, are California v. Central P. R. Co. 127 U. S. 1, 32 L. ed. 150, 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 153, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073; San Benito County v. Southern P. R. Co. 77 Cal. 518, 19 Pac. 827.

In the case of Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Lakin, 53 Wash. 326, 101 Pac. 1094, 17 Ann. Cas. 718, the court said: "The franchise to do business on and over the highways and post roads in the United States is not only a permission, but an advantage to the government, growing out of the necessities of administration. In it the government has an interest. Upon it it must place dependence in time of war and in time of peace. It is a creature not alone of the bounty of the government; it is born of its needs, and is essential to its maintenance. . . . It requires no argument to sustain the point that a mere tax on the privilege of doing business, which in one way or another might interrupt this governmental interest, cannot be sustained."

The transportation line established by Lieutenant Colonel Munson is born of the needs of the Army, or so much of it as is under his command, and "is essential to its maintenance," and is not subject to state regulation or control. If the city can require the transportation line to take out a license as a condition to the right to operate, it can fix and control its tolls, its points and time of departure and return, its routes, and so regulate it as to defeat the purpose for which it was established by the commanding officer of the camp. The power to license includes the power to regulate and control, and thus we would have the situation of the orders of a military officer in time of war subject to control by the city authorities. To illustrate the impotence of the municipal ordinances when it is sought to impose their conditions upon the military authorities in time of war, we need only call attention to those which prohibit keeping explosives within the limits of a city. What effect would such an ordinance have on the action of a military officer who considered it necessary to store ammunition within the corporate limits?

obscured by the difficulty of thinking in terms of war, and attempting to apply doctrines which might be conclusive in time of peace, but which must yield to the higher authority of national necessity in time of war. To appreciate this distinction I need only call attention to the national government "having assumed possession and control of the railroads;" the orders of the Fuel and Food Administrators, and the proposed action by Congress to regulate what food we may eat, and on what days we must abstain from eating prohibited articles.

In the case under consideration the nation in its purpose of carrying on a great foreign war, through the military commander of Camp Joseph E. Johnston, is performing a function which it deems necessary for the morale of the army and the safety of its officers and men, and if the state possesses the power to tax an agency of the Federal government whereby it performs any of its functions, it might so impose taxation as to "cripple, if not wholly defeat, the operations of the national authority within its proper and constitutional sphere of action."

Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed. p. 680, says: "One of the implied limitations is that which precludes the states from taxing the agencies whereby the general government performs its functions. The reason is that, if they possessed this authority, it would be within their power to impose taxation to an extent that might cripple, if not wholly defeat, the operations of the national authority within its proper and constitutional sphere of action."

In the case of Farmers' & M. Sav. Bank v. Minnesota, 232 U. S. 516, 58 L. ed. 706, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 354, the court held that a Federal instrumentality acting under congressional authority cannot be subjected to an occupation or privilege tax by a state.

The petitioner is not only a Federal, but a military, instrumentality, acting under the orders of the commanding officer of Camp Joseph E. Johnston,—a camp organized by congressional authority,—and the franchise or privilege granted the petitioner by Lieutenant Colonel Munson for the safety and morale of his men should not be subjected to the imposition of an occupational tax which might cripple, if not wholly defeat, the purpose for which camps are established—the preparation and training of the army to fight in the great foreign war in which we are now engaged.

The power of Congress to create a vast army to be sent out of the country to engage in a foreign war was fully sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States in a decision rendered by Mr. Chief Justice White on January 7th, in the case of Arver v. United States (U. S. Adv. Ops. 1917-18 p. 193) 245 U. S. 366, 62 L. ed. —, ante, 361, 38 Sup. Ct. Rep. 159, and other cases decided at the same time, known as the "Draft Cases." The court said that the "authority to enact the statute must be found in the clauses of the Constitution giving Congress power 'to declare war; . . . to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.' Article 1, § 8. And of course the powers conferred by these provisions, like all other powers given, carry with them, as provided by the Constitution, the authority 'to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.' Article 1, § 8."

Whatever is done by the military authorities in the organization of the Army provided for in the Act of Congress of May 18, 1917, is done by virtue of this constitutional provision, and the regulation of the Army belongs exclusively to the United States government. If there is any difference in degree in the powers granted to Congress by the national Constitution, the power to declare war, to raise and support armies, to make rules for their government and regulation, is the highest of all, for upon it the existence, the integrity, of the nation depends, and the power of Congress over it is absolute.

While the question presented in this case has never been before the Supreme Court of the United States, there is a long line of decisions on the interstate commerce clause of the Constitution pointing to the conclusion that will be reached by that court whenever this question comes before it, and which guide me in reaching my conclusion.

The power of Congress over interstate commerce is absolute. See Crutcher v. Kentucky, 141 U. S. 47, 35 L. ed. 649, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 851, in which case the court said: "We have repeatedly decided that a state law is unconstitutional and void which requires a party to take out a license for carrying on interstate commerce, no matter how specious the pretext may be for imposing it."

A distinction sought to be made that because the order of the commanding officer of Camp Johnston was not limited to the transportation of the officers and soldiers under his command, but permitted also the transportation of civilians, this license tax may be imposed. The license tax complained of makes no such distinction, but is imposed for the occupation of transporting both the military and civil population, and in this it is obnoxious under L.R.A.1918C.

the doctrine of the Supreme Court of the United States that licenses for carrying on both interstate and intrastate commerce are unconstitutional. The states have the right to impose licenses on intrastate, but not on interstate, business, and they cannot link them together and impose a license on the entire business. In the case of Osborne v. Florida, 164 U. S. 650, 41 L. ed. 586, 17 Sup. Ct. Rep. 214, a state tax imposed upon an express company for doing business in Florida was upheld because the act applied solely to business of the company within the state. The court in that case said: "The statute herein differs from the cases where statutes upon this subject have been held void, because in those cases the statutes prohibited the doing of any business in the state whatever unless upon the payment of the fee or tax. It was said as to those cases that, as the law made the payment of the fee or the obtaining of the license a condition to the right to do any business whatever, whether interstate or purely local, it was on that account a regulation of interstate commerce, and therefore void."

The distinction is clear that, if a license tax is sought to be imposed as a condition to doing a business which includes both interstate and intrastate business, it is void. If, however, the law applies only to intrastate business, it is valid.

Examining the ordinance under consideration, we find that it requires the payment of a fee or tax and the obtaining of a license as a condition to the right to do any transportation business whatever, and includes the transportation of soldiers as well as civilians, and in so far as it does this, it is void.

Although I have discussed this phase of the case, and think it supports my conclusion that the license tax sought to be imposed is inoperative and void in so far as it affects the business which the petitioner is carrying on, still I rest my conclusion particularly and especially on the lack of authority of the state courts to pass upon the validity or the reasonableness of a military order in time of war, and as the petitioner is being held for not taking out a city license for operating a transportation line between Camp Johnston and Jacksonville under the authority of an order of the military arm of the government, his arrest was unauthorized, and he is being unlawfully deprived of his liberty.

When the nation is engaged in a great foreign war which will tax the patriotism of the people to the extremest limit, when our nationals are called upon to give their lives without asking their consent, in order that we may win the war, it seems preposterous to contend for the shadow of state's rights,—if there remains even a shadow of that sacred doctrine upon which rested our constitutional liberties,—and make the collection of a few dollars for licenses paramount to the morale and safety of the soldiers who are called upon to sacrifice their lives for the nation.

The President of the United States has said: "We are now about to accept the gage of battle with the natural foe of liberty, and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the nation to check and nullify its pretentiousness and power."

Camp Joseph E. Johnston was established in pursuance of the plan to prepare an army to carry out this declaration of the President, and the establishment of the bus line by Lieutenant Colonel Munson is the exercise of his military authority to prepare the army to "accept the gage of battle." The bus line is an instrumentality or agency which the commanding officer says is necessary to accomplish this end. Military exigencies or necessities are to be determined by the military authorities, or at least by the national, and not by state, authorities, and a city cannot cripple, hamper, impair, or destroy the instrumentalities established to meet a military necessity or exigency by passing an ordinance imposing a license tax on such instrumentalities, or by applying to them the provisions of an existing ordinance.

I think the application for a writ of habeas corpus should have been granted.

MONTANA SUPREME COURT.

ÆTNA ACCIDENT & LIABILITY COMPANY, Appt.,

v.

H. B. MILLER, Receiver of Farmers' State Bank of Bridger, Montana, Resp't.

(— Mont. —, 170 Pac. 760.)

State — prerogative — priority of claim.

1. The state is entitled to priority over general creditors for repayment of money deposited by it in a bank which becomes insolvent.

For other cases, see Banks, V. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Subrogation — surety of state depository.

2. A surety on the bond of a bank which is a state depository is entitled to subrogation to the right of the state to priority of its claim over that of general creditors in case the bank becomes insolvent and the surety is compelled to pay the state's claim. For other cases, see Subrogation, VI. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

State — priority — abrogation.

3. The state's right to priority for repayment of funds deposited in a bank which becomes insolvent is not abrogated by a statute giving a preference to wage claims in case of insolvency.

For other cases, see Banks, V. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note.—The common-law priority of a state or the United States in payment from assets of a debtor is discussed in the notes to State v. Foster, 29 L.R.A. 226, 243; Re Carnegie Trust Co. 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260; and State v. First State Bank, L.R.A.1918A, 398. The question of the subrogation of a surety to the preference or priority is treated at page 240 of the note first mentioned, and at page 399 of the last-mentioned note. L.R.A.1918C.

Same — waiver of priority.

4. The state does not lose its right to priority in payment of its claims out of funds in an insolvent bank by failing to assert the claim until after the bank's assets have passed into the hands of a receiver appointed at its instance.

For other cases, see Banks, V. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Carbon County sustaining a demurrer to the complaint in an action brought for the determination of plaintiff's claim of priority over general creditors, and for an order directing defendant to make such payment. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Frank & Gaines, for appellant:

Under the common law the Crown, or sovereign power, had originally an absolute preference in the matter of payment of debts due to it, and subsequently this right was modified to the extent that the right attached in all cases where the property sought to be seized and applied to satisfaction of the debt was not subject to a prior lien or liens in favor of other subjects of the Crown.

Messrs. Nichols & Wilson for respondent.

Sanner, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

On May 8, 1915, the affairs of the Farmers' State Bank of Bridger were in such condition that the district court of Carbon county, upon the complaint of the attorney general, filed pursuant to §§ 59 and 60 of chapter 89, Laws of 1915, appointed the respondent, H. B. Miller, as its receiver. There was at the time on deposit with the bank, subject to check, $10,000 of state funds "theretofore raised by levies of taxes, assessments, and collections," secured by a bond in said amount, upon which bond the appellant, Ætna Accident & Liability Company, stood as surety. Thereafter the surety, by and because of the conditions of such bond, was compelled to and did pay to the state the amount of the penalty of the bond, to wit, $10,000. In consequence of these circumstances, as well as of an assignment to it of the state's claim, the surety brought this action, seeking an adjudication that it is entitled to the payment of said sum in preference to the claims of general creditors, and an order directing the receiver to make such payment; he having in his hands funds sufficient for that purpose. Judgment for the receiver followed an order sustaining his general demurrer to the complaint, and this appeal is from that judgment.

The fundamental question presented is: Did the state have the preference right asserted? If it did, there does not seem much room for doubt that, unless in some way lost, such right passed by subrogation to the appellant. Rev. Codes, §§ 5691, 5692, note in 90 Am. St. Rep. 488; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Carnegie Trust Co. 161 App. Div. 429, 146 N. Y. Supp. 804, affirmed in 213 N. Y. 629, 107 N. E. 1087.

Whether the state was entitled to a preference over all the unsecured general creditors of the insolvent bank cannot be determined by resort to any express statute or constitutional provision, for confessedly none such exist; hence the question is one to be resolved according to the common law. Rev. Codes, §§ 3552, 8060. Just what is meant by the "common law" in this connection, however, is a matter open to definition. Broadly speaking, it means, of course, L.R.A.1918C.

the common law of England; but it means that body of jurisprudence as applied and modified by the courts of this country up to the time it became a rule of decision in this commonwealth. State ex rel. Metcalf v. District Ct. 52 Mont. 46, 50, L.R.A. 1916F, 132, 155 Pac. 278, Ann. Cas. 1918A, 985. The distinction is noted here because the common law as administered in England without a doubt commands the recognition of the sovereign as entitled to the preference (1 Co. Litt. 131B; 8 Bacon, Abr. 91); whereas the respondent insists that the common law as recognized and applied in the United States is otherwise.

At the time the territory of Montana was organized and first formally adopted the common law as our rule of decision in the absence of statute (Bannack, Stat. p. 356), there existed a vast number of decided cases from almost all of the states holding that divers and sundry prerogatives ascribed to the King at common law had passed to the states; those only being denied which had attached to the King in his personal character rather than as parens patriæ, or personification of the sovereignty. Among these cases, which are illuminative collaterally, were thirteen directly bearing upon the question here involved, to wit: Eight from Maryland (State v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J. 205, 26 Am. Dec. 561; State v. Baltimore, 10 Md. 504; Jones v. Jones, 1 Bland, Ch. 443, 18 Am. Dec. 327; Smith v. State, 5 Gill, 45; Contee v. Chew, 1 Harr. & J. 417; State v. Rogers, 2 Harr. & McH. 198; Murray v. Ridley, 3 Harr. & McH. 171), one from Georgia (Robinson v. Bank of Darien, 18 Ga. 65), one from North Carolina (Hoke v. Henderson, 14 N. C. (4 Dev. L.) 20, 24), two from South Carolina (State v. Harris, 2 Bail. L. 598; Klinck v. Keckley, 2 Hill, Eq. 250, 256), and one from the Supreme Court of the United States (United States v. State Bank, 6 Pet. 29, 8 L. ed. 308). Of these, only the two opinions from South Carolina deny the right to preference as a surviving prerogative, and they do this without serious attempt to soberly reason the matter. There was an earlier decision in that state, referred to in the Klinck Case (Public Account Comrs. v. Greenwood, 1 Desauss. Eq. 450), which seems to hold that the right, if it exists, cannot prevail over mortgages, judgments, and other liens,—a proposition which, so far as we know, no American court has ever disputed.

When our state Constitution was adopted and the Compiled Statutes of 1887 (including § 201, div. 5) were continued in force, the decided cases bearing upon the particular claim here asserted had been increased by eight (Central Trust Co. v. New York City & N. R. Co. 110 N. Y. 250, 259, 1 L.R.A. 260, 18 N. E. 92; Re Columbian Ins. Co. 3 Abb. App. Dec. 239; State v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. 34 Md. 374; Orem v. Wrightson, 51 Md. 34, 34 Am. Rep. 286; State v. Dickson, 38 Ga. 171; Seay v. Bank of Rome, 66 Ga. 609; State use of Phillips v. Rowse, 49 Mo. 586, 592; Middlesex County v. State Bank, 29 N. J. Eq. 268, affirmed in 30 N. J. Eq. 311), of which one, the New Jersey case, denied the right "as an actual prerogative of government," chiefly because it had not been exerted or recognized in that state for over a hundred years, and "a prerogative which has remained so long practically useless can hardly be said to exist."

Since the adoption of our state Constitution and up to the present time, a considerable addition has been made to the decisions, notably: Booth v. State, 131 Ga. 750, 63 S. E. 502; Re Carnegie Trust Co. 151 App. Div. 606, 136 N. Y. Supp. 466, affirmed in 206 N. Y. 390, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260, 99 N. E. 1096; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Carnegie Trust Co. 161 App. Div. 429, 146 N. Y. Supp. 804, affirmed in 213 N. Y. 629, 107 N. E. 1087; Central Bank & Trust Corp. v. State, 139 Ga. 54, 76 S. E. 587; United States Fidelity & G. Co. v. Rainey, 120 Tenn. 357, 113 S. W. 397; American Bonding Co. v. Reynolds (D. C.) 203 Fed. 356, reversed in Brown v. American Bonding Co. 127 C. C. A. 406, 210 Fed. 844; State v. Foster, 5 Wyo. 199, 29 L.R.A. 226, 63 Am. St. Rep. 47, 38 Pac. 926; State v. First State Bank, — N. M. —, L.R.A.1918A, 394, 167 Pac. 3; Central Trust Co. v. Third Ave. R. Co. 110 C. C. A. 1, 186 Fed. 292; Potter v. Fidelity & D. Co. 101 Miss. 823, 58 So. 713; Commissioners of Banking v. Chelsea Sav. Bank, 161 Mich. 691, 125 N. W. 424, 127 N. W. 351. The last five are usually cited as opposed to the right here claimed, while the others vigorously uphold it; but the five referred to are not entitled to be classed as authoritative voices in opposition. The Wyoming and New Mexico cases, for instance, actually recognize the right, but deny its application to the particular instance; the Federal opinion is squarely in the teeth of a prior declaration to the contrary by the circuit court of appeals of New York, viz., Re Carnegie Trust Co. 206 N. Y. 390, 46 L.R.A.(N.S.) 260, 99 N. E. 1096; the Michigan decision consists of two utterances, one discussing the preference as a prerogative right, but saying: "The question is not presented;" the other seeming to hold that explicit legislation is necessary to put the right into effect; the Mississippi case is squarely against the right, but assigns no reason except Shields v. Thomas, 71 Miss. 260, 42 Am. St. Rep. 458, 14 So. 84, which, so far L.R.A.1918C.

Special notice must, however, be taken of American Bonding Co. v. Reynolds, 203 Fed. 356, and Brown v. American Bonding Co. 127 C. C. A. 406, 210 Fed. 844, because the case which had its issue in these opinions arose in this state and represents an effort to settle the law of this state upon the identical questions now before us. Ordinarily, these utterances would be entitled to very respectful consideration, although in a matter of this sort the voice of the state tribunals is supreme. But the case presents a singular situation. The district court held that the state of Montana has a preference over general creditors to payment from an insolvent debtor; that the right is not discretionary in the officers of the state, but is of a prerogative character; and that it may pass by subrogation to the debtor's surety compelled to make such payment. This was reversed and its standing as authority destroyed on appeal; yet the opinion on appeal is not persuasive for these reasons: It assumes the domestic law of New York to be as stated by the second circuit court of appeals (Central Trust Co. v. Third Ave. R. Co. 110 C. C. A. 1, 186 Fed. 292) against the claim to such prerogative right, notwithstanding the declaration of the highest court of that state in favor of the claim (Re Carnegie Trust Co. supra); it suggests that since the United States asserts its preference under specific statute, and not upon prerogative, this state may not possess any prerogative preference, because "no state can have any greater sovereign right than the general government of the entire country," notwithstanding that the Federal Constitution is a grant of power, and, under Amendment 10, states can and do have sovereign rights which the general government does not possess; it raises the question whether, if the prerogative right exists, such right can pass to a private party by subrogation, without actually deciding whether such right does exist or can so pass; and it determines the appeal upon a proposition which we cannot accept, viz., that the prerogative right, if it exists and can so pass, may be defeated because a ministerial officer of the state has failed to cast its claim in proper form and has assigned that claim to the surety. If anything may be taken as a truism, it is that no right of the sovereign can be waived by any power short of the sovereign; so that, whatever claim on behalf of the state was filed with the receiver, the measure of its demand was not the form of the claim, but the right behind the claim; and, if that right passed by subrogation, no written assignment of any kind could aid it or destroy it.

So much for the decisions, considered numerically. By states and by substance the disparity between the two classes is very marked. Those opposed to the preference seem so overwhelmed by the term "prerogative" that they lose sight of the reality for which it stands and which is inseparable from sovereignty in any form. The prevailing view, and the view that has always held the weight of authority, is emphatically in favor of the preference, and the philosophy of it is sententiously expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States thus: "The right of priority of payment of debts due to the government is a prerogative of the Crown well known to the common law. It is founded, not so much upon any personal advantage to the sovereign, as upon motives of public policy, in order to secure an adequate revenue to sustain the public burdens, and discharge the public debts." United States v. State Bank, supra.

Likewise, the New York court of appeals: "Under our Constitution we have no king. The king, therefore, and the prerogatives that were personal to him, being repugnant to our Constitution, are abrogated; but his sovereignty, powers, functions, and duties, in so far as they pertain to civil government, now devolve upon the people of the state, and consequently are not in conflict with any of the provisions of our Constitution. Inasmuch, therefore, as the claims or moneys due the king for the support and maintenance of the government, whether derived from taxes or other sources of income, were preferred over the claims of others, it follows that, under the first subdivision of the . . . Constitution of 1777, quoted, such preference became a part of the common law of our state, and is so continued under our present Constitution." Re Carnegie Trust Co. supra.

Finally, the court of appeals of Maryland: "Notwithstanding all that has been said in disparagement of this right of priority, it is not perceived to be inconsistent with the principles or spirit of our political institutions. . . . It . . . is a rule only in the distribution of the property of the debtor, requiring the debt due to the state to be first paid, where the individual creditor has no antecedent lien overreaching it. The government of the state is established for the good of the whole, and can only be supported by means of its revenue; which revenue the good of the whole requires to be protected. And as it can only act by its agents, who, no matter how vigilant, cannot always be present to protect its rights, a priority in the payment of its debts (which must always be of a public nature) is necessary to enable it to accomplish the ends of I.R.A.1918C.

its institution. It is not, therefore, opposed to a sense of right that the interests of all should prevail over that of an individual, when it can be asserted without disturbing vested rights, which diligent creditors can more readily acquire than the government through its agents." State v. Bank of Maryland, 6 Gill & J. 205, 26 Am. Dec. 561.

Some contention is made that the provisions of Code, §§ 6123-6125, and 6140, by defining "creditors" and authorizing preferences, operate as an abrogation of any special right in the state under the common law. We do not appreciate the force of this. Sections 6123 and 6124 are not even suggestive. Section 6125 provides that a debtor may pay or secure one creditor in preference to another; if this has any relation to cases of insolvency, it is limited by the rule stated in § 6142, that no voluntary preference can affect or impair the right of a creditor whose claim stands preferred by contract or by operation of law. Section 6140 does deal with insolvency proceedings, and into such it injects an automatic preference in favor of wage claims to an amount not exceeding $200 each; but this at most could amount to nothing more than an assent by the state to share its preference in such cases with such claims. Whether it goes so far is doubtful in the absence of an express declaration to that effect, since the rule—accepted universally we believe—is that the sovereign authority is not bound by the general language of a statute which tends to restrain or diminish the powers, rights, or interests of the sovereign. United States v. Herron, 20 Wall. 251, 22 L. ed. 275; Guaranty Title & T. Co. v. Title Guaranty & S. Co. 224 U. S. 152, 155, 56 L. ed. 706, 708, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 457.

It is insisted, however, that under no theory of the sovereign prerogative accepted in this country can the state's preference prevail "because it was not sought to assert the right in this case until after the debtor's title to the property had been divested and the property passed beyond its control." Undoubtedly the sovereign right of preference is effective only while the debtor retains title to the property out of which payment is sought to be made. But is it correct to say that there was such a divestiture here as to forestall the preference? Counsel cite, as supporting the affirmative, certain cases involving assignments for the benefit of creditors. These, however, are unavailing, because, as we have seen, no such assignment can be effective in this jurisdiction to prevent a preference created by operation of law. Equally valueless are the holdings cited to the effect that a receivership divests the title of the owner; for, whatever may be the law elsewhere, the rule is different in this state. Gardner v. Caldwell, 16 Mont. 221, 224, 40 Pac. 590; Lyon v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 48 Mont. 591, 600, 140 Pac. 86, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 1036. But, it is said, by the receivership the bank lost all control over its assets, and this is sufficient to defeat the preference. It is certainly true that during receivership the owner loses the control of his property, and in receiverships like this such control may never be regained. Yet to regain control is always theoretically possible, for the purpose of any receivership is to husband the property thereby sequestered for whoever may be entitled to it. Nor is it decisive that the receiver may sell, under order of court, because that power is given and may be used only in furtherance of the purpose to husband; so, too, an executor or administrator may sell, yet it cannot be contended that he has title or such control over the real estate of his decedent as would defeat a lawful preference. A receivership and an assignment for the benefit of creditors are two different things. Babcock v. Maxwell, 21 Mont. 507, 513, 54 Pac. 943. But this court has said that the position of a receiver is no better and no higher than that of an assignee; he occupies a situation not materially different from that of the insolvent prior to the appointment; he is the arm of the court to accomplish, when necessary, the distribution of the assets of the insolvent according to the rights of those entitled thereto. Williams v. Johnson, 50 Mont. 7, 144 Pac. 768, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 595. This of necessity involves a recognition of the order in which such rights shall come. The present receivership was procured by the state, under its own banking laws, for the protection of itself and other creditors; it would be a strange result if such a proceeding, so brought, must operate to impair the right thus sought to be conserved.

We see no rational escape from the view that the order sustaining the demurrer to the complaint was a mistake. The judgment founded thereon is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for further appropriate proceedings.

Wilson, C., filed the following opinion:

Plaintiff in error, by his guardian, as plaintiff, sued the defendants in error, as defendants, in the trial court, to set aside and vacate a guardian's sale of certain real estate belonging to him, and to set aside a guardian's deed purporting to convey said land to defendants, and to award the plaintiff judgment for the possession thereof. Several grounds for the relief prayed for were assigned in plaintiff's petition; but the only one relied on in his petition in error, and urged in his brief, is the alleged ground that said deed is absolutely void, for the reason that the guardian's petition for the order of the county court to sell said land did not set out facts sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the court to make the order of sale, and for the further reason that the order of sale made pursuant thereto was absolutely void for want of jurisdiction of the court to make the same. On the trial of the action in the district court, the prayer of plaintiff's petition was denied, and the title of the defendant Charles J. Hubbard forever quieted as against the plaintiff.

The material parts of the petition of plaintiff's former guardian to sell the lands involved in this action, and the one complained of as not being sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the county court to order the sale of land, reads as follows, omitting the description of the lands:

"Your petitioner further states that said Charles Cowen is a minor under the age of fourteen years, and resides with your petitioner, who is his father, and that the said Charles Cowen is a citizen of the Choctaw Nation or Tribe of Indians, of less than L.R.A.1918C.

one-half blood, and that there are no restrictions upon the alienation of his property. Your petitioner further states that as such citizen there has been allotted to him as his allotment, of which he is the fee simple owner, the following lands, to wit: [Describing lands.] That Frances Cowen was the mother of said minor, and a citizen by blood of the Choctaw Nation, and the wife of your petitioner, and that she departed this life about the month of February, 1908, intestate, and left surviving her your said petitioner, her husband, and said minor, Charles Cowen, and Myrtle Susie Cowen, the sister of said Charles Cowen, and that she left no other heirs her surviving, within the said degree of relationship. That as a portion of her allotment as such citizen the said Frances Cowen died seised and possessed of the following described lands, to wit: [Describing lands.] That the said Charles Cowen inherited and became the owner of an undivided one-half interest in the tracts of land last above described upon the death of his said mother, Frances Cowen, and that the said minor is not the owner of any other property, real or personal, except the lands above described, and that he is of scholastic age and should be placed in school.

"Your petitioner further states that said Frances Cowen, mother of said Charles Cowen, aforesaid, died of consumption, and that said disease is hereditary in the family, a number of her family having died of said disease, and that the said Charles Cowen is of a feeble structure and liable to become affected with said disease if kept in the climate where he now lives, and that it is necessary for the health and protection of said minor that he be removed to a more healthy climate, where he will be free from the natural causes which produce disease germs, and that his said land above described can be sold for a reasonable price and will bring their value on the market, and that said land should be sold and the proceeds invested in other real estate in a more healthy climate for the benefit of said minor, or in other revenue-bearing property for his benefit or his maintenance and education, and that a necessity now exists for the sale of said lands for said purposes. Your petitioner therefore prays the order of this court," etc.

Upon the hearing of the petition the county court of Bryan county ordered a sale of the land by the guardian, and it was afterward sold to one of the defendants pursuant to said order or license. Was the petition sufficient to confer jurisdiction on the court to make such order of sale, which would be good as against a collateral attack; this being a collateral attack on the validity of the order?

Section 5498 of Snyder's Compiled Laws 1909 (§ 6553, Rev. Laws 1910) provides: "When the income of an estate under guardianship is not sufficient to maintain the ward and his family, or to maintain and educate the ward when a minor, his guardian may sell his real or personal estate for that purpose, upon obtaining an order therefor."

Section 5499 (§ 6554, Rev. Laws 1910) provides: "When it appears to the satisfaction of the court, upon the petition of the guardian, that for the benefit of his ward his real estate, or some part thereof, should be sold, and the proceeds thereof put out at interest, or invested in some productive stock, or in the improvement or security of any other real estate of the ward, his guardian may sell the same for such purpose, upon obtaining an order therefor."

Section 5502 (§ 6557, Rev. Laws 1910) provides: "To obtain an order for such sale, the guardian must present to the county court of the county in which he was appointed guardian, a verified petition therefor, setting forth the condition of the estate of his ward, and the facts and circumstances on which the petition is founded, tending to show the necessity or expediency of a sale."

It is contended by the plaintiff that a substantial compliance with the provisions of the last-quoted section of the statute was necessary to confer jurisdiction on the court to order the sale of the real estate involved in this action, and that the guardian's petition for such sale did not substantially comply with the provisions of said section, and that consequently the court was without jurisdiction to order the sale, and the sale was void even as against a collateral attack thereon. In Sockey v. Winstock, 43 Okla. 758, 144 Pac. 372, it was held that "the petition of a guardian to sell the real estate belonging to his ward must state the condition of the estate and facts tending to show the expediency or necessity of such sale, in order to give the court jurisdiction to order the sale."

And under that rule it is very doubtful if the allegations of the petition referred to were sufficient to warrant the sale when attacked directly by some proceeding provided by the statute for the express purpose of defeating it; but the action appealed from was a collateral attack on a judgment of a court having jurisdiction of the person and to order the sale of real estate in guardianship matters, and the question for our decision is whether the proceedings were so utterly void as to be subject to an attack of this kind. We think not. In 10 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 782, is the following statement of the law on the subject: "The authority to grant a license to sell real estate carries with it the implied power to determine the necessity for such sale, and the sufficiency of the pleadings presented to the court for that purpose. Therefore, as a general rule, the authority of a guardian's sale cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding on the ground that the petition for the order was insufficient. The power to hear and determine is jurisdictional. If the court thus having jurisdiction errs in holding an insufficient petition to be good, it is mere error, reviewable on appeal, but not a defect of jurisdiction."

To the same effect see United States v. Hine v. Morse, 218 U. S. 493, 54 L. ed. 1123, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 37, 21 Ann. Cas. 782; Equitable Invest. Trust Co. v. Wyandotte County, 86 Kan. 708, 121 Pac. 1097; Wyandotte County v. Equitable Invest. Trust Co. 80 Kan. 492, 103 Pac. 996.

In Baldwin v. Foster, 157 Cal. 643, 108 Pac. 714, the supreme court of California states the rule as follows: "On collateral attack, a judgment will be set aside, generally speaking, for but one of three reasons: Lack of jurisdiction of the person; lack of jurisdiction of the subject-matter; or an absolute lack of jurisdiction to render such a judgment as the one given."

In Reid v. Morton, 119 Ill. 118, 6 N. E. 414, an Illinois case, it is held that "the rule that, where a court has jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties to the litigation, its judgments and decrees will be held valid when questioned collaterally, is held . . . to extend to the special and extraordinary proceedings of a guardian's sale."

In Beachy v. Shomber, 73 Kan. 62, 84 Pac. 547, the identical question under discussion was decided by the supreme court of Kansas in the following language to be found in the syllabus: "A guardian's deed will not be held void upon a collateral attack merely because the petition of the guardian for leave to sell his ward's real estate does not affirmatively show the existence of the conditions which under the statute authorize such sale."

A statute of the state in force at the time the petition complained of was filed and passed on by the county court of Bryan county conferred upon that court the jurisdiction in matters of the estates of minors, and the section of the statute quoted, supra, conferred upon that court the jurisdiction to order a guardian of a minor to sell his ward's real estate under certain conditions and for certain designated purposes. The petition complained of was filed in that court, alleging the fact that the ward had certain real estate in the county, the fact that he was of scholastic age, that he had no other property, that he was predisposed to consumption, and that it was necessary for the preservation of his health that he be removed to a more healthful climate, and that it was necessary to sell the lands in controversy for his benefit and for his maintenance and education; and while the petition was very defective, and probably demurrable, at the same time it was sufficient to invoke the jurisdiction of the court to determine whether, on consideration of the facts alleged, the relief prayed for was within or beyond its jurisdiction, and any mistake the court may have made in its conclusion could have only been error, reviewable on appeal, and could not and did not render the judgment void.

Finding no error in the judgment appealed from, we recommend that it be affirmed.

The coadministrators of the estate of William H. Crone cannot urge and insist that the change of beneficiary to Cora I. Bessett did not take effect because the State Mutual Life Assurance Company did not consent to the change of the beneficiary by indorsing its consent upon the policy in the lifetime of Crone.

Messrs. Waterman & Greenlaw for the Assurance Company.

Baker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal by Jeremiah E. O'Connell and Robert Grieve, as administrators with will annexed on the estate of William H. Crone, late of Providence, in this state, deceased, from a decree of the superior court entered July 7, 1917, in the above-entitled suit.

The complainant, which is a corporation having its home office in Worcester, in the commonwealth of Massachusetts, issued a five-year term policy for $10,000 on the life of said William H. Crone, dated September 22, 1913, payable to said Cora I. Bessett as the "intended wife" of the insured. The policy authorized the insured to exchange it "for a life or endowment policy of like amount," and by it also the right was reserved and secured to "change and successively change the beneficiary" thereunder.

On April 22, 1916, the insured made application to the complainant for the conversion of the policy above referred to to an ordinary life policy, and in place of Miss Bessett nominated his estate as beneficiary. The application for the change of policy and the nomination of the new beneficiary were left at the office of George H. Collett, the general agent in this state of the complainant, and were forwarded the same day to the home office in Worcester by Miss Christine Ludwig, cashier in the Providence office. The original policy, which appears to have been in the possession of Miss Bessett, at this time was delivered to Miss Ludwig on Monday, April 24th, and the same day sent to the home office, and under date of April 25th indorsement was made thereon by the company that the insured nominates his estate as beneficiary. Under date of April 28th the home office sent to Mr. Collett the life policy on Mr. Crone's life for $10,000, payable to the insured's "executors, administrators, or assigns." This policy contained the same privilege that was in the term policy as to the change of beneficiary, and was dated March 22, 1916.

There was testimony that on the morning of May 2, 1916, Mr. Crone signed one of the company's printed forms for the nomination of a beneficiary, on which at that time in the space left for the name of the beneficiary was written in pencil, "C. S. Bess., Fian.," and that after signing he gave it to Mr. Collett to be filled out, and then to be sent to the home office with the new policy in order to have Miss Bessett's name as beneficiary indorsed thereon by the company. There was testimony also that in place of the penciled abbreviations on the nomination paper the words "Fiancée, Cora I. Bessett," were typewritten, and the paper completed before 9 o'clock of the morning of May 3d. On that day, at about thirty minutes after 9 in the forenoon, Mr. Crone died suddenly in his law office. Later in the day the policy of insurance and the new designation of Miss Bessett as beneficiary were sent by mail to the home office, and were there received early on May 4th, and under that date the insuring company indorsed on the policy in the usual form that the insured, under date of May 2d. had nominated "his fiancée, Cora I. Bessett, as beneficiary;" the officers of the company in Worcester not then having heard of the insured's death.

The company raised no question of its liability under the policy, but, inasmuch as Miss Bessett, the administrators with the will annexed, and the next of kin of the deceased, were making claim to the fund, it filed in the superior court its bill of interpleader, making all of the claimants respondents. By decree entered January 15, 1917, the complainant was ordered to pay into the registry of the superior court the sum of $9,441.30 as the amount, less costs of suit and counsel fees, due under the policy, the decree also providing that upon so doing it would be relieved and discharged from all liabilities to the said respondents for or on account of said fund. The complainant, in compliance with the order, paid the money into the registry of the superior court on January 19, 1917. The respondents (excepting one of the next of kin) have interpleaded, and have been heard, and a final decree was entered which directed the payment of the proceeds of the policy now in the hands of the clerk of the superior court to Cora I. Bessett. From this decree the said administrators are the only appellants. The administrators make two objections to the decree: the first, that as a matter of fact Crone did not "authorize or issue" the nomination of Cora I. Bessett as beneficiary; second, that if he did designate her as beneficiary, he did not accomplish the change in the manner called for in the policy.

The court below in its rescript finds that, "after the life policy had been issued and L.R.A.1918C.

returned to the local agent, Crone signed in blank a nomination of the defendant Cora I. Bessett as beneficiary," and that this "nomination of . . . beneficiary was completed before the death of said Crone so far as the filling out of said nomination paper," and in effect says that it was in the possession of the local agent for the purpose of being "returned to the home office for indorsement upon the policy." We think that the court could properly so find and conclude from the evidence, and therefore we accept as a fact that Crone did authorize and issue the nomination of Miss Bessett as beneficiary.

This leaves for consideration the question of whether a change of beneficiary was accomplished by what was done. The provision of the policy relating to a change of beneficiary, so far as it is important in the present case, is as follows: "If the right to do so has been reserved in the application for this policy, the insured, if of full age, at any time during the continuance of this policy, may change and successively change the beneficiary hereunder, whether original or substituted, without his or her assent. . . . Every change or designation must be made by written notice to the company at its home office, accompanied by the policy, and will take effect only when indorsed on this policy by the company."

Mr. Crone in his application reserved the right to change the beneficiary. The general rule in such cases requires the insured, in changing the beneficiary, to do it in the manner pointed out by the policy, the charter, or by-laws of the corporation, or by the statute applicable to the case, if such there be. Any material deviation from such requirements will defeat the attempted change. The cases on this point are so numerous as to render their citation unnecessary.

But there are exceptions to the rule above stated. Cooley, on page 3769 of vol. 4 of his Briefs on Insurance, says: "If, however, the insured has done substantially all that is required of him to effect a change of beneficiary, and all that remains to be done are the ministerial acts of the officers of the association, the change will take effect though the formal details were not completed before the death of the insured."

See also Joyce on Insurance, vol. 2, § 751, and 14 R. C. L. Insurance, § 556.

In Supreme Conclave, R. A. v. Cappella (C. C.) 41 Fed. 1, where the subject is carefully considered, these exceptions are grouped in three classes. An examination of the cases of this character shows that in general they are proceedings in equity, and that the decisions are based on equitable grounds. Cooley, in support of the proposition quoted above, cites, among several other cases, John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. White, 20 R. I. 457, 40 Atl. 5. In that case this court held that the insured had done everything necessary to change the beneficiary, and the fact that the change was not completed in its details was due to the neglect of the company.

In the more recent case of John Hancock Mut. L. Ins. Co. v. Bedford, 36 R. I. 116, 89 Atl. 154, the provision as to change of beneficiary was substantially the same as in the present case. The insured duly filed at the home office a written request upon a blank of the company for a change of beneficiary, but did not present the policy to have the change indorsed thereon, for the reason that the original beneficiary had it in her possession and refused to give it to the insured on his request. The court held that, in consideration of the conduct of the original beneficiary in "unlawfully refusing to deliver up the policy," and of the facts "that the insured had done all that he could do to effect the change of beneficiary," and that the insurer had "disregarded or waived the provision of the policy requiring indorsement of any change of beneficiary," a change of beneficiary had been effected.

This court, therefore, has unmistakably adopted the view that an insured may change a beneficiary under an insurance policy (having reserved the right to do so) by doing all that is required of him to effect the change, or all that is possible for him to do, although certain formal or ministerial acts of the officers of the insurer are not performed before the death of the insured. The question in a particular case, therefore, will ordinarily be as to whether the acts required, but unperformed, were essential parts of the contract or were ministerial and formal details. This distinction will be found to be stated or implied in many of the decided cases, although, as might be expected, courts may have differed as to what acts are ministerial and what essential. This question must be determined by the terms and conditions of the contract contained in the policy and any statute affecting it. If the right to change the beneficiary on the part of the insured be absolute and without condition, and he does all that is required of him by the contract to effect the change, the mere indorsement or noting of the change has been held by many courts to be a formal or ministerial act.

This view was considered at length and upheld in Mutual L. Ins. Co. v. Lowther (1912) 22 Colo. App. 622, 126 Pac. 882. The policy in that case contained a provision for a change of beneficiary by filing a written notice thereof at the home office of the company, together with the policy, L.R.A.1918C.

such change to "take effect upon the indorsement of the same on the policy by the company." The insured died February 22d. Two days before his death he had mailed the policy and his written notice of a change of beneficiary to the home office of the company, where it was received February 24th, and on February 27th the company indorsed the change on the policy. The court in its opinion considers the rights of the insured as to changing a beneficiary and the effect of the death of the insured before indorsement of the change on the policy. Referring to the written notice of change and the policy sent to the home office, it says:

"Had they reached that office before his death the company was legally bound, under the contract, to file the same and indorse on the policy the change of beneficiaries as designated by him. It had no discretion to exercise in the premises. The company could not in the slightest degree question the revocation of the former beneficiary by the insured, nor the selection made by him of the substituted beneficiaries. By the terms of the policy the company had conferred on the insured an unconditional right to, at any time or place, revoke the appointment of the existing beneficiary and substitute another in her place. . . .

"Had the company, when making this contract, reserved any right to itself to control, or finally pass upon, the actions of the insured in changing beneficiaries, we would be confronted with a different question. . . .

"Death intervening between the deposit of the notice in the mail and its full delivery at the home office may, and we think should, be regarded as one of the contingencies making it impossible to complete the change after all had been done that could be done by the insured, and that in such case . . . equity will treat the substitution as complete. . . .

"It appears to the court as illogical to hold that, where the company was bound to give full force and credence to the change, the time of indicating its willingness to do what it was obliged to do, willingly or unwillingly, is of controlling importance. . . .

"The receipt of the notice and policy by the company two days after insured's death, of which it had no knowledge, did not relieve it of the ministerial duty imposed by the terms of the contract of filing and indorsing the same. There is in this case no question of waiver involved, as the company had no discretion in the premises."

These citations are from 22 Colo. App. at pages 629, 630, and 631. While this case does not appear to have been taken to the supreme court of the state, other decisions of that court recognize the exception referred to in the quotation hereinbefore cited from Cooley. See Rollins v. McHatton, 16 Colo. 203, 207, 25 Am. St. Rep. 260, 27 Pac. 254; Johnson v. New York L. Ins. Co. 56 Colo. 184, L.R.A.1916A, 868, 138 Pac. 414. Among many other cases in which the insured did all that was required of him, or all possible for him to do, and a similar conclusion was reached, are McGowan v. Supreme Court, I. O. F. 104 Wis. 173, 80 N. W. 603; Waldum v. Homstad, 119 Wis. 312, 96 N. W. 806; Wandell v. Mystic Toolers, 130 Iowa, 639, 105 N. W. 448; National Asso. v. Kirgin, 28 Mo. App. 80; Walsh v. Sovereign Camp, W. W. 148 Mo. App. 179, 127 S. W. 645; Grand Lodge, A. O. U. W. v. McFadden, 213 Mo. 269, 111 S. W. 1172; Marsh v. Supreme Council, A. L. H. 149 Mass. 512, 4 L.R.A. 382, 21 N. Martin*, 45 Wash. 120, 88 Pac. 106; Berkeley v. Harper, 3 App. D. C. 308; Supreme Conclave, R. A. v. Cappella (C. C.) 41 Fed. 1.

But when the insured has not an unconditional right to change the beneficiary, and the approval or assent of the insurer is, by the terms of the contract, essential to such change, inasmuch as the giving of consent involves the exercise of judgment, it has been held that such consent is not a formal or ministerial act, and accordingly, although the insured may in such case do all required of him, but dies before the insurer's consent is given, it has been held that in such case the change of beneficiary is not effected.

Freund v. Freund, 218 Ill. 189, 109 Am. St. Rep. 283, 75 N. E. 925, is, no doubt, a leading case of the latter kind. The facts relative to the attempt to change the beneficiary, the subsequent death of the insured, and the forwarding of the papers thereafter, are practically the same as in the present case. The company did not, however, indorse the change on the policy. The provision in the policy as to a change in the beneficiary was substantially like that in the policy in this case. In that case the insurer was the New York Life Insurance Company of New York. The statute of New York in force when the policy was issued, and which was held to be part of the contract, provided for a change of beneficiary "at any time with the consent of such corporation." The court's decision that a change of beneficiary did not take effect was based principally on the ground that "the proof in this case shows clearly and without dispute that the company never did give its consent to the change of the beneficiary." It was also in effect held that the provision that the change of beneficiary should "not take effect until indorsed on this policy" was a material part of the contract in providing how "evidence of the company's consent to the change" was to be secured. O'Donnell v. Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. (1915) — Del. Ch. —, 95 Atl. 289; Sheppard v. Crowley, 61 Fla. 735, 55 So. 841; Metropolitan L. Ins. Co. v. Clanton, 76 N. J. Eq. 4, 73 Atl. 1052, and New York L. Ins. Co. v. Murtagh, 137 La. 760, 69 So. 165, are cases of a similar nature in most of which the decision in Freund v. Freund, supra, is cited with approval.

In Modern Woodmen v. Headle, 88 Vt. 37, L.R.A.1915A, 580, 90 Atl. 893, it was provided that no change in beneficiary became effective until "during the lifetime of the member" the old certificate was given up and a new one issued. In that case no change was effected because the member died before the old certificate reached the home office, although after his death, but without knowledge of it, a new certificate was issued. In Hughes v. Modern Woodmen, 124 Minn. 458, 145 N. W. 387, by the contract the change was required to be made by the issuance of a new certificate in "the lifetime of the member." The other cases cited on the administrators' brief, so far as they are pertinent, for the most part show that the change was not effected because in some particular the insured was held to have failed to do all contractually incumbent on him in order to effect the change. We think no useful purpose would be served by discussing them in detail. And it does not seem necessary to consider separately the cases cited which hold that waiver by the insurer after the death of the insured cannot affect the vested rights of a beneficiary: for, however it may be in other cases, in a case where the insured has freedom of choice of beneficiary, makes his choice, and does everything required of him to render it effective, and there remains only the formal or ministerial act of noting the change, if he die before such notation be made, the question of waiver as to the performance of this act is not important, because equity regards the change as already effected by the act of the insured.

If, however, the right to object to the non-performance of a ministerial act does remain in the insurer, we think no one else can insist upon it, and that the company could waive it. In the present case the company, by making no attempt to recall its indorsement, and by bringing Miss Bessett into court by its bill of interpleader, can be held to have waived its right to object, if any it had. The form of the indorsement used by the company contains no language implying its consent to be necessary, and in fact it does not profess to give consent. It simply notes the change made by the insured. On the original policy the indorsement is: "Worcester, Mass., April 25, 1916. The insured under date of April 22, 1916, nominates his estate as beneficiary under this policy. . . ."

The indorsement of the nomination of Miss Bessett as beneficiary under the new policy is in the same form. In each instance the indorsement was signed by the vice president of the company. Mr. Crone, in making this latter change, did the same things he had done ten days before to change the beneficiary under the original policy. In both cases he did all that was required of him to make the change.

For reasons already indicated, we are of the opinion that the decision of the superior court and the final decree entered in conformity therewith were correct.

The appeal, therefore, is denied and dismissed, said decree is affirmed, and the cause is remanded to the Superior Court for further proceedings.

Vincent, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of certiorari filed for the purpose of bringing before this court for review the record of the superior court in a cause entitled Dorothy Drew v. J. Samuels & Bro., Inc., et al., Law No. 581, Washington County. A writ of certiorari was issued, and the record in question is now before us.

The cause we are asked to review is an action for false imprisonment brought by Dorothy Drew against J. Samuels & Brother, Incorporated, and Nazaly Avedisian as joint tort-feasors. The case was tried in the superior court. The trial was concluded on October 10, 1917. The jury rendered a verdict of guilty against both defendants, and assessed damages in the sum of $1,358.

Later, on October 13, 1917, each of the defendants filed a motion asking for a new trial. The usual common-law grounds were included in both motions, but they differed as to other alleged errors. During the argument before the trial court on the motions for a new trial, counsel for Dorothy Drew, the plaintiff, moved to dismiss the motions of the defendants for a new trial on the ground "that it appears of record that the verdict undertaken to be appealed from was and is joint against all the parties defendant, whereas said petition or motion is singular and several, and fails to join all the parties defendant;" whereupon the further hearing of the matter was postponed for one week, the plaintiff in the meantime filing formal motions in writing to dismiss the several motions of the defendants for a new trial, one of which said motions to dismiss being filed October 31 and the other November 3, 1917. The defendant J. Samuels & Brother, Incorporated, also filed a motion on November 8, 1917, asking that it might be permitted to join the defendant Avedisian in its motion for a new trial, and that it might be permitted to so amend its said motion, and in these requests the said Avedisian joined.

On November 8, 1917, a hearing appears to have been had on the motions to dismiss the motions of the several defendants for a new trial, and on the following day the superior court rendered a decision granting the motion of the plaintiff to dismiss the motion of each of the defendants.

On November 17, 1917, the superior court rendered a further decision denying the motion of the defendant J. Samuels & Brother, Incorporated, to join the defendant Avedisian in its motion for a new trial. In reviewing this record the defendants direct our attention to two questions: (1) Was the decision of the superior court dismissing the motions of the defendants for a new trial correct? and (2) Was the decision of the superior court refusing to permit the amendment of the motion of J. Samuels & Brother, Incorporated, by adding thereto the name of Nazaly Avedisian as a joint moving party, and refusing to permit Nazaly Avedisian to join in the motion of J. Samuels & Brother, Incorporated, for a new trial, proper?

In dismissing the motion of the defendants for a new trial, the superior court seems to have based its decision upon the cases of Bassett v. Loewenstein, 22 R. I. 468, 48 Atl. 589, and Winsor v. Cook, 35 R. I. 472, 87 Atl. 318, and the decision of this court on the motion for a rehearing in Bassett v. Loewenstein, — R. I. —, 48 Atl. 934. In examining these two cases and other cases cited therein, some important differences between them and the case at bar may be noted. In Bassett v. Loewenstein the suit was against copartners, and the court held that one of two defendant copartners could not take an appeal. This decision is in accord with the case of Curry v. Stokes, 12 R. I. 52, where the court held that one of two plaintiff copartners could not take an appeal. The correctness of these decisions cannot be denied. In the one case it is held suit must be brought, judgment entered against both defendants, and execution issued as against both. In the other case judgment must be entered in favor of both plaintiffs and execution must issue accordingly. This is not so in the case at bar, as it would have been competent for the jury to have found one of the defendants guilty and the other not guilty, or to have found both guilty or not guilty. If one had been found not guilty, he would thereafter have no appealable interest, and could neither join or be joined in the appeal. It is true that in Curry v. Stokes, supra, the court said: "Even one of two defendants cannot, as a matter of course, appeal from a judgment rendered against both of them jointly."

As the question before the court in that case related solely to copartners, this language amounts to nothing more than a dictum, which is not even positive in its terms, but expresses some qualification, the exact nature of which is not clear.

In the case of Gencarelle v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 21 R. I. 216, 44 Atl. 174, the plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, voluntarily joined themselves in a suit to recover compensation for services rendered by both of them to the defendant, in the nursing and care of one who had received an injury through the defendant's alleged negligence. After nonsuit the husband alone petitioned for a new trial, and the court held that the petition in such case was in the nature of an appeal, and must be joint; and it also held, the plaintiffs being husband and wife, that the evidence showed that the claim was not joint, but several, and that under the statute they must each sue alone, referring to R. I. Gen. Laws, chap. 246, § 14, which provides that "in all actions, suits, and proceedings, whether at law or in equity, by or against a married woman, she shall sue and be sued alone."

It is to be noted that in all of these cases to which we have referred the motion for a new trial or the appeal was filed by one of several plaintiffs or defendants without any action in that regard being taken by the other defendant or defendants, and in that respect they differ from the case at bar, where each of the defendants has preferred a motion for a new trial.

At the trial of the present case in the superior court, each of the defendants was represented by personal counsel, and the defense of each was conducted independently. Each counsel was entitled to propound to the witnesses such questions as he might see fit and to take such exceptions as in his judgment were best adapted to conserve and protect the interests of his client. In such a trial it cannot be reasonably expected that the two defendants would be equally interested in every portion of the testimony, and that in all respects it would bear evenly upon them. Each defendant is entitled to take an exception to the admission or rejection of testimony and to other rulings or to portions of the charge of the court as he may see fit, and in so doing he is not dependent upon the co-operation or concurrence of another defendant with whom he has been associated.

If joint tort-feasors were bound to act together in all proceedings, it is easy to see how one defendant might be deprived of substantial rights by the action or non-action of another. If defendants were compelled to file a joint motion for a new trial, and it should appear, as it might, that one defendant had good grounds for a new trial, and that the other defendant had not, it would logically follow that such motion should be denied. In 14 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 871, it is stated that "motions for a new trial may be made jointly by all the parties plaintiff or defendant. But such practice should be avoided in all cases except where it is clear that the grounds for the motion will be sustained as to all parties joining in the motion."

It has been held in several states that, when there is a verdict against all of the defendants, a motion for a new trial made by the defendants jointly must be overruled, if the verdict was correct as against any one of them. Scott v. Chope, 33 Neb. 41, 92, 49 N. W. 940; Robertson v. Garshweiler, 81 Ind. 463; First Nat. Bank v. Colter, 61 Ind. 153; Miller v. Adamson, 45 Minn. 99, 47 N. W. 452.

We think that, inasmuch as the practice in this state permits one joint defendant to interpose a separate defense and to take exceptions without the concurrence of the other defendant or defendants, it cannot be said consistently that he should be deprived of an independent opportunity of presenting the questions arising under the exceptions in which he alone may be interested, without subjecting himself to the danger of losing his rights by joining with other defendants in a motion for a new trial, which, according to some of the authorities cited, must be denied if the verdict as to either defendant is justified.

It cannot be denied that in an action brought against several defendants as joint tort-feasors it would be competent for the jury to find all the defendants guilty, or all not guilty, or a part guilty, and the other not guilty. Terpenning v. Gallup, 8 Iowa, 74; Hayden v. Woods, 16 Neb. 306, 20 N. W. 345; New Mexico & S. P. R. Co. v. Madden, 7 N. M. 215, 34 Pac. 50. In our statute (chap. 298, § 12) it is provided that "any person or party entitled to except in a cause or proceeding tried by a jury in the superior court may file . . . a motion for a new trial for any reason for which a new trial is usually granted at common law. . . ."

We think that under this provision a defendant who has the right, under the practice which obtains in this state, to take an exception for his individual benefit, is a person who may file his motion for a new trial, and that the language of the statute above quoted is indicative of an intent on the part of the legislature to make some distinction between persons and parties, and to afford to litigants an opportunity to proceed in motions for new trials singly or collectively, as the circumstances of the particular case might seem to require. It would be absurd for us to hold that a defendant having the right to an individual exception could not prosecute it, or that, having such right, he could only prosecute it in connection with another defendant perhaps having no interest therein.

In the case of State v. Brown, — R. I. —, 102 Atl. 65, Brown, Spellman, and Healis were jointly indicted for murder, and Elizabeth F. Mohr was also indicted with said defendants as accessory before the fact. Healis pleaded nolo, and sentence was deferred. The defendants Brown and Spellman were found guilty, and filed separate bills of exceptions. Mrs. Mohr was acquitted. Each of the parties was represented by a separate counsel. The counsel for Mrs. Mohr did not appear for or represent the other defendants, and the defenses of the several defendants were separate, and not joint. The defendant Mrs. Mohr filed a motion to quash the indictment on the ground that the statute under which she was indicted was unconstitutional. This motion was denied. She later moved that the constitutional question be certified to the supreme court, and that motion was also denied. The other defendants made no attempt in the superior court to raise a constitutional question. Mrs. Mohr, having been found not guilty, had no further interest in the matter. The defendants Brown and Spellman, in their respective bills of exception, sought to avail themselves of the exception taken by Mrs. Mohr to the ruling of the superior court upon her motions relating to the constitutional question. Upon that question this court said: "It is quite obvious . . . that if these defendants here were 'aggrieved' by the ruling or decision of the superior court in denying Mrs. Mohr's motion to certify constitutional questions to this court, they should have taken exception thereto in the superior court. It cannot be held, as contended on behalf of these defendants, that because these defendants and Mrs. Mohr were tried together under one indictment, each of these defendants should be able to avail himself of exceptions taken solely on behalf of Mrs. Mohr at a preliminary hearing on a question which, so far as the record discloses, solely interested Mrs. Mohr, in which they were not interested, and in which they took no part. If the position here taken by these defendants were tenable, it would result that, although all the defendants were separately defended, each by his own counsel, and made different and distinct defenses, counsel for each defendant should be deemed, for the purposes of subsequent procedure after trial, in the prosecution of exceptions, to have been the agents and representatives of each of the other defendants, although they had not been appointed or selected for such purpose. We think the language of the statute plainly intends that the defendant, seeking to avail himself in this court of exceptions taken in the superior court, must have taken the exceptions there on his own behalf. If these defendants had desired to raise the same constitutional questions in the superior court as were raised on behalf of Mrs. Mohr, they could have done so, just as they did raise other questions which were not raised by Mrs. Mohr, and as to which they are now prosecuting their exceptions."

This court also held that the trial court was in error in disallowing two of the individual exceptions of the defendant Spellman.

The case of State v. Brown presents substantially the same question which is presented in the case at bar, although approached and discussed inversely, and it upholds the proposition that a defendant joined with others, appearing by his own counsel and making his own defense, is entitled to the benefit of his own exceptions, but cannot profit by the exceptions of other defendants in which he has not primarily participated.

We think that the superior court should have heard and determined the defendants' motions for a new trial, and the record of that court so far as it relates to the dismissal of such motions is therefore quashed.

Having reached this conclusion, it follows that the motions to amend the original motions for a new trial were entirely unnecessary, and were properly denied.

The record in the case is remitted to the Superior Court.

Petition for rehearing denied.

Annotation—Rights of individual tort-feasors against whom a joint verdict has been obtained, as to new trial and appeal.

It is the purpose of the present annotation to cover both the question whether a judgment against two or more joint tort-feasors may be set aside as to some and allowed to stand as to the rest, and the question of the right of such joint tort-feasors to make separate motions for a new trial, or to take separate or individual appeals. Many of the cases dealing with the first question are treated in the note to Sparrow v. Bromage, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209, and consequently the present annotation is merely supplementary thereto on this phase of the general question above outlined.

As to reversal of judgment on appeal or error by one joint defendant as affecting other joint defendant in whose favor judgment below was rendered, see annotation to Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Austin, L.R.A.1917D, 666.

May judgment against two or more tort-feasors be set aside as to some and allowed to stand as to the rest.

Supplementing note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209.

As is pointed out in the note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209, the early or common-law rules were that a new trial could not be granted to one of several tort-feasors against whom a joint judgment had been obtained, and that such a judgment could not be affirmed as to some defendants and reversed as to others, but the decided trend of modern opinion does not permit the artificial and technical reasoning upon which such rules were founded to preclude the granting of a new trial or the reversal of a judgment as to one of several defendant joint tort-feasors, where the furtherance of justice seems to require such action and the interests of the remaining defendants are not thereby prejudiced; and in this breaking away from the restrictions of ancient rules, the courts have been frequently aided by legislation.

Additional authority supporting the rules laid down by the early cases follows: Thus, in Illinois the well-settled rule is that an entire judgment against joint tort-feasors, if not good as to all the defendants, must be reversed as to all, and that it cannot be affirmed as to some and reversed as to the others. The following cases, in addition to those set out in the earlier note, lay down this rule: United Breweries Co. v. Bass (1905) 121 Ill. App. 299; O'Donnell v. Kavanaugh (1910) 158 Ill. App. 599; Devine v. Illinois Teleph. Constr. Co. (1911) 159 Ill. App. 600, holding that the appellate court cannot even reverse the judgment as a whole and remand the cause with permission to the plaintiff to dismiss as to the defendant against whom the judgment was erroneous, and enter judgment against the other defendants on the verdict; Fuller v. Kelso (1911) 163 Ill. App. 576; Pressley v. Kinloch-Bloomington Teleph. Co. (1911) 164 Ill. App. 167. And in the following early New York cases the rule was laid down that an entire judgment against joint tort-feasors cannot be severed on writ of error so as to permit reversal as to one as to whom it was erroneous, and affirmance as to other defendants, and that, if reversed at all, it must be reversed as to all: Cruikshank v. Gardner (1842) 2 Hill (N. Y.) 333; Harman v. Brotherson (1845) 1 Denio (N. Y.) 537. And this even though it is admitted that there could have been a severance in the lower court. Cruikshank v. Gardner (N. Y.) supra. But this rule seems to have been superseded and changed by later decisions under the Code. See New York cases in note in 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 209, and additional cases set out infra. And see also the following recent cases, in which it was recognized that the general common-law rule was that a reversal of a judgment against several joint tort-feasors, because erroneous as to a part of the codefendants, necessitated a reversal as to all the defendants; but in which such rule was not adhered to: North Alabama Traction Co. v. Hays (1913) 184 Ala. 592, 64 So. 39; Zibbell v. Southern P. Co. (1911) 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513; Fearon v. Fodera (1915) 169 Cal. 370, 148 Pac. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312; Clark v. Torchiana (1912) 19 Cal. App. 786, 127 Pac. 831; Brown & Sons Lumber Co. v. Sessler (1913) 128 Tenn. 665, 163 S. W. 812, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 103, 7 N. C. C. A. 614; Pence v. Bryant (1913) 73 W. Va. 126, 80 S. E. 137.

Of course, this rule will be followed where to hold otherwise would prejudice the interests of some of the defendants. Thus, in Menton v. Lee (1870) 30 U. C. Q. B. 281, where a general verdict was obtained against several tort-feasors which was clearly erroneous as to some, it was held that there must be a rule absolute for a new trial, and that the verdict could not be allowed to stand as to one, especially where such action might work an injustice as to him. And see Washington Gaslight Co. v. Lansden (1899) 172 U. S. 534, 43 L. ed. 543, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 296, wherein the court reversed a judgment in toto for error as to some of the defendants, and granted a new trial to all the defendants, on the ground that it might work injustice if left intact as against one of the defendants only.

In Miller v. United R. Co. (1911) 155 Mo. App. 528, 134 S. W. 1045, following Mulderig v. St. Louis, K. C. & C. R. Co. (1906) 116 Mo. App. 655, 94 S. W. 801, which is set out in the note in 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) at p. 214, it was held that where, by virtue of a statute, contribution may be had among joint tort-feasors, a judgment against two tort-feasors must be reversed as to both, although prejudicial error intervened as to one only.

But, as stated above, the early and so-called common-law rule that, if an entire judgment against several joint tort-feasors is reversed as to one, it must be reversed as to all, in many jurisdictions, has been either relaxed by judicial decision, or modified or entirely superseded by statute. Thus, in Angell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1916) 98 Kan. 268, 157 Pac. 1196, denying rehearing of (1916) 97 Kan. 688, 156 Pac. 763, it was held that an entire judgment against joint tort-feasors may be affirmed as to a part of them and reversed as to others where no substantial injustice will result, as, for example, where an error was committed which was prejudicial to some of the individual defendants, and not as to other defendants, the court saying that this is "the more reasonable, as well as the more modern, rule." And in McGee v. Vanover (1912) 148 Ky. 737, 147 S. W. 742, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 500, it was expressly held that, where several tort-feasors are sued jointly and a joint judgment obtained, there may be a reversal as to some and an affirmance as to another, without the validity of the judgment being affected as to the latter. And in Ohio the rule seems to be that a judgment against joint tort-feasors may be reversed as to some and affirmed as to other defendants. See Reugler v. Lilly (1875) 26 Ohio St. 48, and Norton v. Parker (1896) 17 Ohio C. C. 715, 8 Ohio C. D. 572, both of which are set out on p. 215 of the note in 27 L.R.A. (N.S.). But see to the contrary the earlier case of Blanchard v. Gregory (1846) 14 Ohio, 413, wherein it was held that a judgment against joint tort-feasors which was erroneous as to one defendant was erroneous and must be reversed as to all. And in North Alabama Traction Co. v. Hays (1913) 184 Ala. 592, 64 So. 39, it was said that while, as a general rule, joint judgments are to be treated as entireties on appeal, and a reversal on the appeal of one requires a reversal as to both, such principles have no application where, on the undisputed facts, one party had no proximate or responsible connection with the wrong complained of, that in such a case a reversal of the judgment as to such party does not require a reversal of the judgment against the guilty party, and that the judgment should be affirmed as to the latter. In this case the court said that the policy of the "general rule" stated by it was that, where the rights and obligations of the parties are necessarily blended in the judgment, and are thus dependent one upon the other, though they be not strictly joint, the appellate court will render such judgment as will permit and require the entire controversy to be settled in one proceeding in which the rights and liabilities of all parties may be considered and consistently determined, and that, under the facts of the case under consideration, such policy would be adhered to by reversing as to the party obviously not responsible, and affirming as to the party clearly guilty of the wrong complained of.

And in California under a statute (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 578, 579) providing that judgment may be for or against one or more of several defendants sued as joint tort-feasors, it has been held that, where an entire judgment has been taken against several joint tort-feasors, it may be affirmed as to some and reversed as to others if the proofs justify it. Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co. (1906) 149 Cal. 151, 86 Pac. 178; Zibbell v. Southern P. Co. (1911) 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513, holding that, where an entire judgment has been taken against several joint tort-feasors consisting of a railway company and its servants, it could be affirmed as against the company and some of the servants and reversed as to another servant as to whom it was erroneous; Clark v. Torchiana (1912) 19 Cal. App. 786, 127 Pac. 831. This rule was again recognized in Fearon v. Fodera (1915) 169 Cal. 370, 148 Pac. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312.

So, in New Jersey, under the provision of the Practice Act of 1912 (Pamph. Laws 1912, p. 397) that, where a new trial is granted, "it shall only be a new trial of the question or questions with respect to which the verdict is found to be wrong, if separable," it has been held that, where a judgment has been obtained against joint tort-feasors which is wrong as to some, but correct as to the others, the judgment, so far as it is correct, will be affirmed, and reversed only as to the others. Hagy v. Hafner (1914) 86 N. J. L. 502, 94 Atl. 48, holding that the statute applied to a judgment against joint tort-feasors, and that the questions concerning the liability of the different defendants were "separable" within the meaning of the act. Upon the latter question the court argued as follows: "The statute referred to is remedial in character, having for its purpose the limitation of unnecessary litigation, the 1st section declaring that it 'shall be liberally construed, to the end that legal controversies may be speedily and finally determined according to the substantive rights of the parties.' Separable, as used in the statute, means a distinct cause of action existing in the suit, on which a separate and distinct action may be brought, and complete relief afforded as to such cause of action. In joint torts the plaintiff may proceed against the persons jointly liable in one action, or against them separately; judgment against one, when satisfied, barring an action by the plaintiff against the other joint wrongdoers."

And in New York the later cases decided under the Code support the view that a judgment against joint tort-feasors may be reversed as to some and affirmed as to others. Schultz v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (1911) 201 N. Y. 230, 94 N. E. 601, affirming (1909) 134 App. Div. 260, 118 N. Y. Supp. 977, holding that where, in an action for false imprisonment and malicious prosecution against two defendants, a judgment was obtained against both, such judgment, in form against both, was jointly and severally enforceable, and could be reversed as to one and enforced as to the other defendant.

And again in Tennessee, under a statute providing that no judgment shall be reversed in the supreme court unless for errors which affect the merits of the judgment complained of, it is held that the technical rule that a judgment is an entire thing and if void as to one party cannot be allowed to stand as to any of the other parties falls within the statute, so that it cannot be set up that a judgment against joint tort-feasors which is bad as to one of the defendants is bad as to all, at least, where it is not erroneous as to the party asking that it be declared bad as to all the defendants. Smith v. Foster (1866) 3 Coldw. (Tenn.) 147; Brown & Sons

Lumber Co. v. Sessler (1913) 128 (Tenn.) 665, 163 S. W. 812, Ann. Cas. 1915C, 103, 7 N. C. C. A. 614, holding that the rule that a judgment against joint tort-feasors may be reversed as to one and affirmed as to others is the more modern rule, is obviously just, and is founded on common sense. And see Nashville Street R. Co. v. Gore (1901) 106 Tenn. 390, 61 S. W. 777.

And where an appellate court may affirm as to a part and reverse as to the rest of the joint tort-feasors, against all of whom an entire judgment has been obtained, it naturally follows that a new trial may be granted as to one or more, and not as to the others. See Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co. (Cal.) supra, holding that the granting of a new trial as to one of two joint tort-feasors did not vacate the verdict and judgment as to the other; Clark v. Torchiana (1917) 19 Cal. App. 786, 127 Pac. 831; and Hagy v. Hafner (1914) 86 N. J. L. 502, 94 Atl. 48.

And where an entire verdict has been rendered against joint tort-feasors, the plaintiff may dismiss his suit as to a part of the defendants, and take judgment against the others. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Likes (1907) 225 Ill. 249, 80 N. E. 136; Siltz v. Springer (1908) 236 Ill. 276, 85 N. E. 748; Pecararo v. Halberg (1910) 246 Ill. 95, 92 N. E. 600; Pence v. Bryant (1913) 73 W. Va. 126, 80 S. E. 137, holding that this is the rule sustained by reason and by the later authorities. And in Carper v. Risdon (1904) 19 Colo. App. 530, 76 Pac. 744, it was said that an action based on a joint trespass and brought against the trespassers might, "at any time before judgment," have been dismissed by the plaintiff as to one defendant and continued as to the other. Also, in Western U. Teleg. Co. v. Griffith (1900) 111 Ga. 551, 36 S. E. 859, 8 Am. Neg. Rep. 200, it was said that, in an action brought against joint tort-feasors, the plaintiff could, after verdict, abandon his case as to some of the defendants and proceed against the others. This rule is based upon the theory that, since there is no contribution between joint wrongdoers, the defendant against whom the judgment was rendered cannot complain that such a course is irregular, even if it is so regarded. Postal Teleg.-Cable Co. v. Likes (Ill.) supra.

A fortiori, a plaintiff who has obtained a verdict against two joint tort-feasors may have the action dismissed as to one of them and judgment entered against the other, where all the parties consented to such dismissal. Dewoody v. Guertin. (1899) 13 Colo. App. 517, 58 Pac. 794. In this connection the court said: "We can discover no basis for the contention that the judgment is irregular and void because the verdict was against Dewoody and Baker, and the judgment only against Dewoody, because prior to the entry of judgment the parties stipulated that the action might be dismissed as to Baker. We see no reason under those circumstances why, he being eliminated from the case and the verdict being against Dewoody, the judgment should not follow as against the complaining party. There might be circumstances, perhaps, under which some question might be raised respecting the regularity of such proceedings, but in this case it appears that all parties selected as defendants, if found liable, were joint tort-feasors, and any one, two, or more, or all, might be sued, and, since they are jointly and severally liable, a recovery can be had against one for all the damages, or a judgment against them all and a collection enforced as against one. We can discover no legal or insurmountable reason against the entry of judgment against Dewoody on the verdict when by his consent Baker was dismissed from the action."

And in jurisdictions where the plaintiff has a right to take judgment in an action of tort against a part only of those against whom a verdict is rendered, and dismissed as to the others, it follows that the trial court may grant a new trial to such others without dismissing. Pecararo v. Halberg (1910) 246 Ill. 95, 92 N. E. 600. And see to the same effect Pence v. Bryant (1913) 73 W. Va. 126, 80 S. E. 137, which in effect overrules Tracy v. Cloyd (1877) 10 W. Va. 19, wherein it was held that a verdict against joint trespassers upon a joint plea cannot be vacated as to only one of the defendants. In the Pence Case the court said that the early rule of entirety of verdict and judgment is a purely technical one, and is not sustained by reason or by later authorities, and that even if plaintiff made no offer to dismiss as to one against whom the verdict was erroneous, it was the duty of the trial court upon a joint motion for a new trial to grant such a new trial as to that defendant, and let the verdict stand as to the others. So, in the Pennsylvania case of Crane v. Lynch (1905) 27 Pa. Super. Ct. 565, where a verdict was obtained against joint tort-feasors, and it was then discovered that one of the defendants was a minor, the court directed the plaintiff to enter a nolle prosequi as to such minor, and the verdict and judgment were allowed to stand as against the other defendant, the court saying that the result of such procedure was to leave the latter exactly as if he had been sued alone, and that plaintiff could have sued him alone had he so elected. And in Indiana it has been held that, upon a joint motion for a new trial after an entire verdict for wilful tort against two joint tort-feasors, the court may grant the motion as to one defendant and deny it as to the other, and such other cannot assign such action as error, at least in the absence of a separate motion for a new trial, he not being prejudiced, as he is severally liable for the whole judgment, and not entitled to contribution from his codefendants. Kelley v. Kelley (1893) 8 Ind. App. 606, 34 N. E. 1009, petition for rehearing overruled in (1894) — Ind. App. —, 36 N. E. 165. And in South Carolina it is held that it is within the province of a trial judge to grant a new trial in any case where several tort-feasors are sued and the verdict is against all or more than one, and if, in his opinion, the evidence does not sustain the verdict as to some, but does as to others, he may grant it as to the former and deny it as to the latter, provided it is reasonably certain that no injustice will result to the defendant or defendants against whom the verdict is allowed to stand. Webber v. Jonesville (1913) 94 S. C. 189, 77 S. E. 857, holding that, where punitive damages are assessed, it is better practice to grant a new trial as to all. And in Tennessee the rule is that a joint verdict against several tort-feasors may be set aside by the trial court as to those defendants as to whom it is found erroneous, and sustained and enforced against others as to whom it is found to be correct. Nashville Street R. Co. v. Gore (1901) 106 Tenn. 390, 61 S. W. 777. Likewise, in Washington it has been held that, where a joint verdict had been obtained against tort-feasors, the action of the trial court in setting aside the verdict as to one defendant cannot be urged as error by the other defendants, the theory being advanced that, since the defendants are separably liable, no one but the plaintiff can object to a dismissal as to one or more of the defendants condemned by a verdict. Birkel v. Chandler (1901) 26 Wash. 241, 66 Pac. 406. And in Kentucky where separate or joint judgments are authorized against one or more joint defendants, as the case may require, the court may, upon motion for a new trial by joint tort-feasors against whom a joint verdict has been obtained, grant a new trial as to part of them and let the verdict stand as to the others. Loving v. Com. (1898) 103 Ky. 534, 45 S. W. 773.

In connection with the practice as to new trial in the English court of appeal since the Judicature Act 1890, see Order 39, r6, which in effect provides that, where a wrong or miscarriage affects some or one only of the parties, the court may give final judgment as to some or one only of the parties, and direct a new trial as to the other party or parties.

Separate motions and appeals.

The early English authorities seem to be to the effect that a verdict cannot be set aside or a new trial granted at the instance of some joint tort-feasors as to them, and allowed to stand as to the other defendants. See Parker v. Godin (1728) 2 Strange, 813, 93 Eng. Reprint, 866. And see also Bond v. Spark (1700) 12 Mod. 275, 88 Eng. Reprint, 1318, wherein it was held that a new trial could not be granted to one of three tort-feasors, even though the others had been acquitted by the verdict, but that a new trial, if granted, must be as to all; unless, perhaps, where a new trial is granted as to some with the consent of all, as was the case in Price v. Harris (1833) 10 Bing. 331, 131 Eng. Reprint, 932, 3 Moore & S. 838, 3 L. J. C. P. N. S. 73.

And in North Carolina the early cases ruled that one of several tort-feasors against whom a joint judgment had been obtained could not appeal therefrom, it being said that such a judgment is a joint one against all the defendants, and that an appeal by less than all the defendants must be dismissed on motion therefor. Donnell v. Shields (1848) 30 N. C. (8 Ired. L.) 371. This case seems to go to the extent of holding that one defendant cannot appeal if his codefendants refuse to join. However, the decision relies upon earlier ones made in actions ex contractu. And in North Carolina the rule has been so changed by statute that either party may now appeal. See Clarke's Code Civ. Proc. (N. C.) 1900, § 547.

But the rule supported by the majority of the cases, and especially of the more recent ones, is that a single joint tort-feasor may move for a new trial of an issue which resulted in a joint judgment, although he and his codefendants were sued jointly, pleaded jointly, and defended jointly. This rule was expressly laid down in Albright v. McTighe (1892) 49 Fed. 817 (one of three moved for a new trial and motion was granted). And see the supporting dicta in Fernandez v. Calaf (1914) 7 Porto Rico Fed. Rep. 80. And that in Ohio tort-feasors against whom a joint judgment has been obtained may make separate motion for a new trial, see Heffner v. Moyst (1883) 40 Ohio St. 112, wherein separate motions for a new trial by judgment defendants who had been sued as joint tort-feasors, but had pleaded separately, were entertained. And see Hayden v. Woods (1884) 16 Neb. 306, 20 N. W. 345, wherein it was said that this rule is based upon the ground that, since the liability of joint tort-feasors is both joint and several, and the verdict may be against one, and not the other, it reasonably follows that a new trial may be granted to one, and not the other, where separate motion therefor has been made.

And similar conclusions have been reached under a number of statutes. Thus, in Connecticut, where a statute gives the right of appeal to any party aggrieved, one of two joint tort-feasors, against both of whom an entire judgment has been obtained, may, upon filing the statutory notice of appeal, take an appeal without joining his codefendant or obtaining from the court an order of severance. Brockett v. Fair Haven & W. R. Co. (1900) 73 Conn. 428, 47 Atl. 763, holding that a severance is made where one joint tort-feasor in pursuance of statutory authority continued the cause in another court, and the other codefendant did not appear, although he had a right to do so by virtue of the filing of the notice of appeal by the continuing defendant. And under a California statutory provision that judgment may be for or against one or more of several defendants sued as joint tort-feasors, it has been held (Fearon v. Fodera (1915) 169 Cal. 370, 148 Pac. 200, Ann. Cas. 1916D, 312), that one of several joint tort-feasors against all of whom a judgment has been obtained may take an appeal therefrom or move for a new trial without joining the other codefendants, or even notifying them of his intention to do so. In Rhode Island, where the practice permits one joint defendant to interpose a separate defense and to take exceptions without the concurrence of his co-defendants, and by statute it is provided that any party entitled to except may file a motion for a new trial for any reason for which a new trial is usually granted at common law, it has been held that joint tort-feasors against whom a single verdict has been rendered, but who made separate defenses, may make separate motions for a new trial. J. SAMUELS & BRO. v. SUPERIOR CT. ante, 967. And in New York it has been held that a judgment in form entire against joint tort-feasors, since it is severally as well as jointly enforceable, may be appealed from or submitted to by any defendant individually. Schultz v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. (1911) 201 N. Y. 230, 94 N. E. 601, affirming (1909) 134 App. Div. 260, 118 N. Y. Supp. 977, holding that where one defendant only appealed his codefendant submitted to any judgment that might be rendered.

And in New Mexico it has been held, without reference to statutory provision, that where a judgment is rendered against tort-feasors jointly one may bring error to review the same without joining the other defendants and without notice of severance. New Mexico & S. P. R. Co. v. Madden (1893) 7 N. M. 215, 34 Pac. 50, holding that, upon review of a judgment against joint tort-feasors upon the appeal of one, the judgment need not be reversed as to the other defendant, and it being said that if such other desired a reversal he should have asked for it.

But the weight of authority, at least in the absence of statutory provision, is that where tort-feasors are sued jointly and a joint judgment obtained, one tort-feasor cannot sue out a writ of error without reference to his codefendant, or any showing that the latter had been notified to appear and failed to do so, or had refused to join in the proceedings in error (Holbrook, C. & D. Contracting Co. v. Menard (1906) 76 C. C. A. 258, 145 Fed. 498; Interurban Street R. Co. v. Menard (1906) 76 C. C. A. 260, 145 Fed. 500); or in other words, that all parties against whom a joint judgment in a tort action has been rendered are necessary parties to a review by an appellate court, and the failure to join them is generally ground for dismissal (Kansas City v. Hart (1899) 60 Kan. 684, 57 Pac. 938; Palmer v. Kennedy (1830) 7 J. J. Marsh. (Ky.) 498). It has been said that the reasons for this practice are that the successful party may be at liberty to proceed in the enforcement of his judgment against the parties who do not desire to have it reviewed, and that the appellate tribunal shall not be required to decide a second or third time the same question on the same record. Holbrook, C. & D. Contracting Co. v. Menard (Fed.) supra.

But where one of the defendants refuses to join in a writ of error or an appeal, the other has a formal remedy by summons and severance, or its equivalent, which under the more modern and liberal practice is a showing by the record that the party had been notified to appear and had failed to do so, or that he appeared and refused to join, in either of which cases it has been held the court has jurisdiction to entertain the motion of the party who prayed for it as to his own interest. Holbrook, C. & D. Contracting Co. v. Menard (Fed.) and Palmer v. Kennedy (Ky.) supra, holding that an appeal may be taken from a joint judgment by one of the defendants against the will of his codefendant. And it has been held that it is no objection to the jurisdiction of an appellate court that all the parties against whom a joint judgment for a tort has been obtained did not unite in bringing a single proceeding for review, where the petitioner's codefendants were made defendants in error in the proceedings for review. Kansas City v. Hart (Kan.) supra (both judgment defendants brought separate proceedings for review, joining the other as a defendant in error, so that all the parties were before the court in each of the proceedings). #### TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY, Plff.
in Certiorari,
v.
LEWIS & ADCOCK COMPANY.

(— Tenn. —, 201 S. W. 131.)

Carrier — loss — agreement to pay — discrimination.

1. An agreement by a terminal carrier to pay for injury to an interstate shipment not occurring on its lines is void for discrimination where the bill of lading provides that no carrier shall be liable for loss not occurring on its own road.

For other cases, see Carriers, IV. c, 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Estoppel — to deny liability — illegal contract.

2. A terminal carrier is not estopped to deny liability under its promise to pay a loss not occurring on its own line, is void as an unlawful discrimination, by the fact that the shipper has, in reliance on the promise, lost his remedy against the carrier liable for the loss.

For other cases, see Estoppel, III. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — assignment of error — sufficiency.

3. An assignment that the trial court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury is equivalent to an assignment that there was no evidence to support the verdict.

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a judgment affirming a judgment of the Circuit Court for Knox County in favor of plaintiff in a suit to recover, under an alleged agreement with defendant's agent, for injury to a shipment of oats. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Roscoe Word, for plaintiff in certiorari:

This being an interstate shipment, the only right that plaintiffs have to recover, if at all, is by virtue of the bill of lading or contract issued to the Richter Grain Company, which was transferred to plaintiffs, upon their paying the draft through the local banks; they thereby becoming the owners of the said car of oats, and parties to said bill of lading.

Rep. 391; Southern R. Co. v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 632, 60 L. ed. 836, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Robinson, 233 U. S. 173, 58 L. ed. 901, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Maxwell, 237 U. S. 94, 59 L. ed. 853, L.R.A.1915E, 665, P.U.R.1915C, 300, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 494.

Mr. J. M. Meek also for plaintiff in certiorari.

Mr. A. C. Grimm for defendant in certiorari.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit was brought by Lewis & Adcock to recover $150, the amount of damage claimed to have been suffered by a carload of oats. The oats were shipped from the Richter Grain Company in Cincinnati, Ohio, to the plaintiffs below at Knoxville, Tennessee, on a uniform through bill of lading. The car was routed over the Cincinnati, New Orleans, & Texas Pacific Railroad and the Southern Railway Company.

The proof showed clearly that the grain was damaged prior to its delivery to the Southern Railway Company. This fact is not controverted.

The plaintiffs below introduced proof tending to show that they had made a claim against the Southern Railway Company for damage to this shipment, and that an agent of the Southern Railway Company had agreed to pay them for this damage $150. This was denied by the railway company.

The railway company also relied on a stipulation in the bill of lading as follows: "No carrier shall be liable for loss, damage, or injury not occurring on its own road, or its portion of the route, nor after said property has been delivered to the next carrier, except as such liability, is, or may be, imposed by law."

There was a judgment against the railway company for $150, the amount sued for, in the court below, and this judgment was affirmed by the court of civil appeals. A petition for certiorari has been granted by this court and the case heard by us.

It may be conceded that there is sufficient evidence in the record to sustain the finding of the jury establishing the agreement between Lewis & Adcock and the claim agent of the Southern Railway Company, whereby the railway company undertook to pay $150 for the damage sustained by this carload of oats.

Nevertheless it is contended by the railway company that if such an agreement were made, it was illegal and beyond the power of the carrier or any of its agents. We think this contention must be upheld.

Recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States construing the acts of Congress declare that there must be uniformity in rates, uniformity in service, and uniformity of responsibility on the part of all carriers engaged in interstate commerce. The duties and responsibilities of such carriers are defined in the contracts or bills of lading filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission and the acts of Congress, and these duties and liabilities may not be varied either by act of the carrier or the shipper, or, indeed, by state laws. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ward, 244 U. S. 383, 61 L. ed. 1213, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617; Georgia, F. & A. R. Co. v. Blish Mill. Co. 241 U. S. 190, 60 L. ed. 948, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 541; Southern R. Co. v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 632, 60 L. ed. 836, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Robinson, 233 U. S. 173, 58 L. ed. 901, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Harold, 241 U. S. 371, 60 L. ed. 1050, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kirby, 225 U. S. 155, 56 L. ed. 1033, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 501.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kirby, supra, the carrier undertook to make a contract with the consignor for an expedited shipment of horses from a point in Illinois to New York city. This was a special contract, no form of which was on file with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by the terms of which a preference or advantage was given to the shipper. Such contract was held to be illegal.

In Georgia, F. & A. R. Co. v. Blish Mill. Co. 241 U. S. 190, 60 L. ed. 948, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 541, in discussing a provision of an interstate bill of lading, which it was urged the carrier had waived, the court said: "But the parties could not waive the terms of the contract under which the shipment was made pursuant to the Federal act; nor could the carrier, by its conduct, give the shipper the right to ignore these terms which were applicable to that conduct and hold the carrier to a different responsibility from that fixed by the agreement made under published tariffs and regulations. A different view would antagonize the plain policy of the act and open the door to the very abuses at which the act was aimed."

In Southern R. Co. v. Prescott, 240 U. S. 632, 60 L. ed. 836, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469, the court said: "It is also clear that with respect to the service governed by the Federal statute the parties were not at liberty to alter the terms of the service as fixed by the filed regulations. This has repeatedly been held with respect to rates [citing authorities], and the established principle applies equally to any stipulations attempting to alter the provisions as fixed by the published rules relating to any of the services within the purview of the act [citing authorities]. This is the plain purpose of the statute in order to shut the door to all contrivances in violation of its provisions against preferences and discriminations."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Harold, 241 U. S. 371, 60 L. ed. 1050, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 665, the court said that the view pointed out in the previous decisions with respect to congressional legislation upon this subject was "that its prime object was to bring about a uniform rule of responsibility as to interstate commerce and interstate commerce bills of lading."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Robinson, 233 U. S. 173, 58 L. ed. 901, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, the court said that the view pointed out in the previous decisions with respect to congressional legislation upon this subject was "that its prime object was to bring about a uniform rule of responsibility as to interstate commerce and interstate commerce bills of lading."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Robinson, 233 U. S. 173, 58 L. ed. 901, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 556, the court said that the view pointed out in the previous decisions with respect to congressional legislation upon this subject was "that its prime object was to bring about a uniform rule of responsibility as to interstate commerce and interstate commerce bills of lading."

Rep. 556, the court denied the power of a carrier to enter into a verbal contract for an interstate shipment different in terms from the contracts on file with the Commission.

In Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ward, supra, the court reannounced the rule laid down in Georgia, F. & A. R. Co. v. Blish, and held that the parties could not waive the terms of the contract under which shipment was made pursuant to the Federal act.

As heretofore seen, the contract in this case provided that no carrier should be liable for loss, damage, or injury not occurring on its own road, or its portion of the route, except as such liability is, or may be, imposed by law.

The Carmack Amendment was enacted to create in the initial carrier unity of responsibility for the transportation to its destination. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. v. Riverside Mills, 219 U. S. 186, 31 L.R.A. (N.S.) 7, 55 L. ed. 167, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 164; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ward, supra, and cases cited. The Carmack Amendment does not preclude a limitation of responsibility to a shipper by a connecting carrier for damage not occurring on its own line. Such limitation is good at common law.

The presumption is that the bill of lading here exhibited has been duly filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hobbs, 136 Tenn. 512, 190 S. W. 461.

We must conclude, therefore, under the authorities heretofore cited, that the remedies of the shipper are confined to those prescribed in the bill of lading or contract. The shipper can demand no more than he is entitled to under such contract, nor can the carrier voluntarily assume any additional obligation in favor of a particular shipper.

The court of civil appeals was of opinion that the defendant railway company was estopped to rely on this provision of the contract in view of the fact that the plaintiffs had, by reason of the alleged promise to settle, probably lost their remedy against the carrier or party responsible for this damage. As we have seen, however, the cases hold that the carrier cannot waive the terms of the contract, nor do we think any estoppel could arise by reason of its conduct. Estoppel is founded in equity. It can never be asserted to uphold fraud or wrong of any character. 10 R. C. L. 690; 16 Cyc. 747.

Under the acts of Congress it is unlawful for any shipper to receive any benefit or advantage to which all other shippers are not entitled at the hands of a carrier. An estoppel cannot be invoked to obtain for a shipper an unlawful preference.

It is urged on behalf of Lewis & Adcock that the question discussed has not been properly presented for the consideration of this court under our rules. It is said that there is no assignment of error here to the effect that there was no evidence to sustain the judgment in the lower court.

There is, however, an assignment of error in this court as follows: "The court of civil appeals was in error in holding that the circuit court was not in error in overruling defendant's motion made at the close of all the evidence to peremptorily instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor."

An assignment to the effect that the trial court erred in not peremptorily instructing the jury is equivalent to an assignment of error that there was no evidence to support the verdict, since, under our practice, there could be no peremptory instructions unless there was no evidence to the contrary.

Such a motion is sufficiently broad to cover the questions made by the railway company in this case. Southern Ice Co. v. Black, 136 Tenn. 401, 189 S. W. 861, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 695; Cincinnati N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Bonham, 130 Tenn. 435, 171 S. W. 79.

It follows that the judgment of the lower courts will be reversed, and the suit dismissed.

Annotation—Waiver by carrier of contractual rights under interstate shipments as unlawful discrimination among shippers.

The opinion in Southern R. Co. v. Lewis & A. Co. ante, 976, shows clearly the attitude most courts have taken in respect to the question here annotated. The theory is that terms and conditions, when filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, must be enforced by the carriers without exception, to prevent discrimination among shippers. In one or two cases the court has limited this theory to the fixing of rates or conditions that directly influence the rate charged. See Donohoo Horse & Mule Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1915) 95 Kan. 681, 149 Pac. 436, and Doster v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1915) 196 Ill. App. 49, as cited infra. But the Federal courts do not seem to place such limitation upon their holdings, and their decisions are followed by most state courts. As a Federal question is involved, no doubt all state courts will, in the end, abandon the practice of limiting their holdings. What prevents the waiver is apparently not the fact that the parties to the particular contract have previously agreed, but that the terms of the contract constitute a universal rule which must be enforced on all shippers. It must be here assumed that the terms of the particular contract are not in conflict with the statutes, but are in the nature of supplements thereto. Otherwise, the contract would be illegal and unenforceable without a waiver. The question of waiver of time stipulation in carrier's contract for claim or suit against carrier was considered in the note to Ray v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. L.R.A.1916D, 1049, where several cases are cited tending to show that such stipulation cannot be waived on interstate shipments. Later cases of this kind are cited herein. Not many cases involving other conditions or stipulation have been reported.

In addition to the cases cited in that note, it has been directly held in recent cases that it is a discrimination contrary to the Federal statutes to permit the waiver of a clause in a carrier's contract for an interstate shipment, providing that notice of claim must be given to the carrier within a given time. Abell v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1917) 100 Kan. 238, 164 Pac. 269; Metz Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1917) 227 Mass. 307, 116 N. E. 475; Barton v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1917) — Mo. App. —, 196 S. W. 379; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Lynn (1916) — Okla. —, 161 Pac. 1058; Dean v. Southern R. Co. (1917) — S. C. —, 91 S. E. 1042.

In Dean v. Southern R. Co. (S. C.) supra, the court said: "As a defense to the action, defendant alleged and the proof showed that plaintiff had not given written notice of his claim for damages in compliance with the following stipulation in the bill of lading: 'That as a condition precedent to any right to recover any damage for loss or injury to said live stock, notice in writing of the claim therefor shall be given to the agent of the carrier actually delivering said live stock wherever such delivery may be made, and such notice shall be so given before said live stock is removed or is intermingled with other live stock.' Against objection of defendant, the court admitted testimony which plaintiff offered to show waiver of the written notice required by the stipulation, and instructed the jury that, although the stipulation was valid and binding upon the parties, nevertheless it might be waived by the defendant, and submitted to them the question whether, in fact, it had been waived, and instructed them, further, that unless they found from the evidence that it had been waived, their verdict should be for the defendant. While the exceptions challenge the correctness of other rulings and instructions, we need consider only the one above stated, as that will be decisive of the case. This court held in Crawford v. Southern R. Co. (1915) 101 S. C. 522, 86 S. E. 19, that such a stipulation might be waived. But more recent decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, whose decisions are controlling, show that such a stipulation in an interstate bill of lading, if valid and applicable, cannot be waived. Southern R. C. v. Prescott (1916) 240 U. S. 632, 60 L. ed. 836, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Northern P. R. Co. v. Wall (1916) 241 U. S. 87, 60 L. ed. 905, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 493; Georgia, F. & A. R. C. v. Blish Mill. Co. (1916) 241 U. S. 190, 60 L. ed. 948, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 541; Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. McLaughlin (1916) 242 U. S. 142, 61 L. ed. 207, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 40."

In Metz Co. v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1917) 227 Mass. 307, 116 N. E. 475, supra, the court said: "The jury made an express finding, however, that the condition of the bill of lading requiring written notice of loss within four months had been waived by the defendant. This finding was warranted by the evidence. Therefore, the single question presented is whether such a condition in a bill of lading can be waived under the Federal laws relating to interstate commerce. This is a question touching which the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States are binding. The Interstate Commerce Act supersedes all state laws as to the subject over which Congress thus has put forth its superior power. Corbett v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1914) 219 Mass. 356, 107 N. E. 60, 9 N. C. C. A. 691. This question presented in the case at bar seems to us to be set at rest by Georgia, F. & A. R. Co. v. Blish Mill. Co. (1916) 241 U. S. 190, at page 197, 60 L. ed. 948, 952, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 544, where it was said: 'The parties could not waive the terms of the contract under which the shipment was made pursuant to the Federal act; nor could the carrier by its conduct give the shipper the right to ignore these terms which were applicable to that conduct and hold the carrier to a different responsibility from that fixed by the agreement made under the published tariffs and regulations. A different view would antagonize the plain policy of the act, and open the door to the very abuses at which the act was aimed. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kirby (1912) 225 U. S. 155, 166, 56 L. ed. 1033, 1038, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 501.' Those words are exactly applicable to the facts here presented. They were used in the course of a decision respecting a clause in a bill of lading in effect the same as that here involved. While the facts of that case were slightly dissimilar to those of the case at bar, they are not different in substance, and they call for the operation of the same principles of law. It cannot be presumed that the words just quoted were used inadvisedly or without a full appreciation of the natural force to be attributed to the comprehensive reference to waiver in that connection. This decision appears to mean that, when the form of the bill of lading with its numerous contractual provisions has been filed according to law with the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the interstate rate for transportation has been fixed with reference to the terms and obligations of that uniform bill of lading, then those contractual terms and obligations become a part of the rate established and neither party can depart from them. The shipper and the carrier become bound inexorably by them. This decision was foreshadowed by Southern R. Co. v. Prescott (1916) 240 U. S. 632, 60 L. ed. 836, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 469; Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Carl (1913) 227 U. S. 639, 57 L. ed. 683, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 391; and Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Kirby (1912) 225 U. S. 155, 56 L. ed. 1033, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 648, Ann. Cas. 1914A, 501; and perhaps in other decisions. Waiver by the railroad of an obligation resting on the shipper or consignee would operate to that extent to create a preference in favor of that particular shipper or consignee and a discrimination against all others to whom a like concession is not made. But it is the plain purpose of the Interstate Commerce Act and its amendments to prevent all favoritism by the carrier toward shippers and to put all shippers on the same footing. The public policy of the country has been declared to this end in no unmistakable terms in numerous decisions. Boston & M. R. Co. v. Hooker (1914) 233 U. S. 97, 58 L. ed. 868, L.R.A.1915B, 450, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, L.R.A.1918C.

The shipper cannot waive the stipulation in such contracts any more than the carrier can. Thus, it was held in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Ward (1917) 244 U. S. 383, 61 L. ed. 1213, 37 Sup. Ct. Rep. 617, that the shipper's acceptance of a bill of lading from a connecting carrier containing stipulations not in the bill of lading issued by the initial carrier, or contrary thereto, was not a waiver thereof, since the parties could not waive the conditions set out in the original bill of lading. The stipulation here involved concerned the liability of the connecting carrier under the Carmack Amendment. Of course, the decision involves the illegality of the provisions of the second bill of lading, and to that extent the case is not in point on the question of waiver.

And in Donohoo Horse & Mule Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1915) 95 Kan. 681, 149 Pac. 436, it was held that an agreement that fixed the value of horses and the carrier's liability for loss at $100 per head, freight rate being based upon that liability, and the carrier maintaining a higher rate on higher valuation, could not be waived by the parties; but it was also held that a stipulation for the bringing of suit or action within a specified time after the loss could be waived, since the provision did not in any way affect the rate. The court, in Doster v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1915) 196 Ill. App. 49, took the same position as to the waiver of the time stipulation. It there said: "We do not think that the act was intended to apply to conditions in a contract between a carrier and a shipper that are not determinative of the rate established. If the defendant is right in its present contention, it would follow that it could not waive any of the many provisions and regulations in the present contract. It is obvious that serious and injurious consequences to shippers would result if the contention of the defendant should prevail. The act was certainly not passed for the purpose of enabling carriers to obtain advantages over shippers in the matter of conditions or regulations in contracts that are not determinative of the rate established, that they did not have before the passage of the law. The mere fact that the defendant incorporated into the 'live stock contract' form that was filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, provisions that were not determinative of the rate established, would not, in our judgment, give to the defendant, in the matter of the said provisions, the new advantage over the shipper, of being able to evade the effect of a waiver by the carrier of the said provisions. The contract so filed expressly stated the provision that determined the lower rate, and it is reasonable to presume that all other provisions in the contract would be contained in a contract based upon the regular rate. Nor are we able to see how the fact that the carrier might accept and pay, on its merits, a claim of one shipper growing out of alleged negligence, and at the same time refuse to accept and pay, on its merits, a like claim of another shipper (neither having presented his claim within the time limited by his contract for transportation), would constitute an act of preference or discrimination within the meaning of the act, where it appeared from the contract of the party whose claim was accepted and paid, that the provision waived did not in any way affect the rate established. In support of its contention that it would be a violation of the act in question for the railroad company to waive the five-day claim limitation clause, the defendant cites Clegg v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1913) 122 C. C. A. 273, 203 Fed. 971; Kidwell v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1913) 125 C. C. A. 313, 208 Fed. 1; Davenport v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1914) 87 Misc. 303, 149 N. Y. Supp. 865. We find nothing in the first two cases that supports the defendant's contention. In fact, we think that these cases, by strong inference, at least, are adverse to defendant's contention. In the third case cited, practically no facts are stated in the opinion, and it is impossible to tell whether the time-limit clause in the contract that was before the court was determinative of the rate established. If it were, an entirely different question from the one now before us was presented. The court in that case L.R.A.1918C.

decided that the facts did not establish a waiver, and it expressed a doubt as to whether the carrier had the power to waive the time-limit provision for the reason that the form of the bill of lading under which the shipment was made had been approved by the Interstate Commerce Commission. The following cases hold that it would not be a violation of the act for a carrier to waive a provision like the one in question: Donahoo Horse & Mule Co. v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (Kan.) supra; Crawford v. Southern R. Co. (1915) 101 S. O. 522, 86 S. E. 19, 11 N. C. C. A. 541; Clingan v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. (1913) 184 Ill. App. 202. The stipulation as to notice was for the sole benefit of the carrier, and before the passage of the act the courts repeatedly held that similar provisions could be waived, and as the present one was not determinative of the rate in the contract, we fail to see any good reason for holding that it would be a violation of the act for the defendant to waive the same. We think the conclusion we have reached is entirely in harmony with the reasoning of the court in Boston & M. R. Co. v. Hooker (1914) 233 U. S. 97, 58 L. ed. 868, L.R.A.1915B, 450, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 526, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 593." But the Kansas case here cited is apparently overruled in Abell v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1917) 100 Kan. 238, 164 Pac. 269, as cited supra, where the doctrine of the earlier case is repudiated, without reference thereto. It will be observed that the earlier case was decided before the Federal courts had so thoroughly established the contrary doctrine.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Jasper County sustaining a demurrer to a petition filed to recover damages for injuries caused by alleged negligence and malpractice of defendant. Affirmed.

Statement by Preston, J.:

As appellant states his claim, this is an action at law brought by plaintiff to recover damage for injuries caused by defendant's negligence and malpractice as a physician and surgeon and by his fraud and fraudulent deception therein in connection with electric rays, radioexposures, and use of an X-ray machine, and medical services therewith. Plaintiff sued for $50,000. Defendant interposed a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained, and, plaintiff electing to stand upon his petition, judgment was rendered against him for costs, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Messrs. W. G. Clements and O. P. Myers, for appellant:

The cause of action is not barred by the Statute of Limitations.

Preston, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is alleged that plaintiff was born September 2, 1884, and became of age in 1905. He was injured about June, 1901; he was treated and burned by defendant as hereinafter stated, in July of that year; some time in 1908 defendant moved to Wisconsin L.R.A.1918C.

and became a nonresident of Iowa; some time in the year 1912 the tissues where he had been burned broke down and became a malignant cancerous growth, necessitating the amputation of his arm, and it is alleged that this condition was first discovered in 1912. This action was brought September 20, 1915.

Complaint is made by appellant that the court erred in sustaining defendant's motion to strike parts of the petition wherein it is alleged that defendant used the X-ray machine without the knowledge of plaintiff's parents. The parents are not suing in this action, and, in the view we take of the case, the ruling on the motion to strike is not material and would not have made a case on demurrer or prevented the running of the Statute of Limitations had the motion not been sustained. The real question in the case, as conceded by appellant, is whether his claim is barred by the Statute of Limitations. We have not been favored with an argument for appellee. We prefer argument, because in its absence the court is compelled to make an independent investigation.

It is alleged in the petition, substantially: That in 1901, when plaintiff was under seventeen years of age, he accidentally broke his right wrist. It had been set by other doctors, but about June 1901, defendant used his X-ray machine in one application upon plaintiff's wrist to determine whether the bones were properly set, and found that they were. At this time and for some years prior thereto defendant had been a regular practising physician and surgeon. That thereafter and during the month of July, 1901, upon the request of defendant, and for the benefit of defendant, he called plaintiff into his office, without the knowledge or consent of plaintiff's parents, and experimented upon plaintiff with defendant's X-ray machine to secure pictures of plaintiff's hand and wrist. That he continued for ten days in said experiments, and used the X-ray machine on plaintiff's hand and wrist many times and made long and close exposures. That as a result thereof the skin on his hand and wrist became discolored. Defendant then informed plaintiff and his parents that the use of the X-ray machine caused such discoloration, and defendant then falsely and fraudulently informed plaintiff and his parents that this discoloration was of no particular consequence and would be temporary in its effects, and defendant fraudulently concealed from plaintiff and his parents the true effect of radioexposure produced by the X-ray machine. That defendant then treated said discoloration for a time and it apparently disappeared, leaving a scar, but with usual use of the hand. That plaintiff and his parents fully relied upon the statement and advice of defendant as to the temporary effect of said X-rays, and nothing further was done in regard thereto until 1912. That the use of said machine by defendant produced a cancerous condition which was latent and dormant until 1912, and plaintiff had no knowledge of said condition until then. That at said time the tissues of the right hand where the X-rays had been applied broke down and became an epithelioma or malignant cancerous growth, causing plaintiff great pain, suffering, and mental anguish, greatly injuring his general health, and necessitating the amputation of his right forearm in order to save his life. That at great expense during and since 1912 he has advised with the most skilful physicians and surgeons and experts, and made every effort to overcome the effects of said X-rays upon him as used by defendant, but that the outcome is not fully determined. That the loss of his right arm has greatly incapacitated him from earning his livelihood. That plaintiff was guilty of no contributory negligence. That in using said machine defendant was negligent, and thereby caused said injury. That defendant by such use well knew that he had produced effects and conditions that would finally develop into a malignant cancerous growth, which he knowingly and fraudulently concealed from plaintiff. That said action and representations of defendant were a fraud upon plaintiff, which fraud was not known to plaintiff until 1912. That said fraud consisted in inducing plaintiff, then a minor, to submit his right hand to the X-ray and X-ray machine, plaintiff being wholly ignorant of the effects and use thereof; and, further, in representing to plaintiff and his parents that the discoloration produced by such use was only temporary, and, further, by knowingly and fraudulently concealing from plaintiff and his parents the real nature and effect of the negligent use of said machine, all which fraud was not known to plaintiff until the year 1912.

The demurrer was in this form: That the petition shows upon its face that the plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by the Statute of Limitations, in that: (a) The said cause of action did not accrue within three years prior to one year after the plaintiff attained his majority, and no sufficient facts are stated to postpone the running of the Statute of Limitations. (b) That the gist of plaintiff's action is negligence, and his cause of action, if any, accrued at the time the injury was done, whether the extent was then known or not. (c) That under the law, the right to maintain an action for negligence is distinguished from the measure of damages resulting from such negligence, and although the entire damages resulting from the alleged negligence of the defendant was not known to the plaintiff until his time of recovery was barred, yet the time in which the action may be brought was not prolonged thereby. (d) That said statute does not run from the time of the consequent injury to the plaintiff. (e) That plaintiff's cause of action is not founded on fraud, and the allegations of the petition do not defeat the bar of the statute.

Appellant has not argued the question as to whether, if a cause of action accrued at the time of the original injury, suit could have been brought by plaintiff by his guardian or next friend, or whether he would have time, after attaining his majority, to bring suit, nor is the question of the effect of defendant's removal from the state in 1908 argued; doubtless on the theory that if a cause of action accrued to plaintiff in 1901, it would be barred in any event. As bearing on the first proposition, see Murphy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 80 Iowa, 26, 45 N. W. 392; Roelefsen v. Pella, 121 Iowa, 153, 96 N. W. 738.

Appellant says in argument that there is only one main controlling question to present to this court in this cause; that the demurrer raises only one question, and that is the question of the Statute of Limitations; that he insists by actual fraudulent concealment by defendant this cause or right of action did not accrue until the year 1915, the time of bringing this action, and hence the action is not barred; that the main legal proposition is that where a party against whom a cause of action existed in favor of another, by fraud or actual fraudulent concealment, prevented such other from obtaining knowledge thereof, the Statute of Limitations would only commence to run from the time the right of action was discovered, or might, by the use of diligence, have been discovered. The only authorities cited are in support of this proposition. Appellant cites Boomer v. French, 40 Iowa, 601; Wilder v. Secor, 72 Iowa, 161, 2 Am. St. Rep. 236, 33 N. W. 448; Carrier v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 80, 6 L.R.A. 799, 44 N. W. 203; Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 551, 564, 9 L.R.A. 764, 25 Am. St. Rep. 512, 46 N. W. 1080; Bradford v. McCormick, 71 Iowa, 129, 32 N. W. 93; Findley v. Stewart, 46 Iowa, 655, 657; Cress v. Ivens, 155 Iowa, 17, 20, 134 N. W. 869; Aultman, M. & Co. v. Adams, 35 Mo. App. 503; Mullen v. Callanan, 167 Iowa, 367, 379, 149 N. W. 516.

The gist of plaintiff's cause of action is based upon the alleged negligence of defendant in 1901, and the claim that defendant fraudulently concealed some of the effects of the injury caused by the X-ray machine. It is alleged that defendant knew and fraudulently concealed from plaintiff that the burning in 1901 would result in cancer. Necessarily the statement by defendant that the injury in the first place was only temporary would be his opinion, unless cancer results in all cases from such burning, and the pleading of such fact would, to a certain extent, be pleading a conclusion. It is not specifically alleged that burnings of this character result in cancers in all cases, though one part comes very close to it.

It is not claimed by appellant, as we understand it, that his cause of action is based on fraud under § 3448 of the Code. Under that section it is provided that the cause of action shall not be deemed to have accrued until the fraud shall have been discovered by the aggrieved party, and Code, § 3447, ¶ 6, limits to five years the period within which an action may be brought in such cases.

It has been held that the fraud contemplated in § 3448 is only such as was heretofore solely cognizable in chancery, and that where the fraud is not of that character, but the plaintiff's remedy is concurrent, the exception there made does not apply. Gebhard v. Sattler, 40 Iowa, 152; Brown v. Brown, 44 Iowa, 349; Phoenix Ins. Co. v. Dankwardt, 47 Iowa, 432; Relf v. Eberly, 23 Iowa, 467; McGinnis v. Hunt, 47 Iowa, 668; Carrier v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 80, 6 L.R.A. 799, 44 N. W. 203; Daugherty v. Daugherty, 116 Iowa, 245, 90 N. W. 65; West v. Fry, 134 Iowa, 675, 11 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1191, 112 N. W. 184; Baird v. Omaha & C. B. R. & Bridge Co. 111 Iowa, 627, 82 N. W. 1020.

The last two cases distinguish between fraud and mistake. In Lougee v. Reed, 133 Iowa, 48, 110 N. W. 165, it was held that § 3448 has no application to an action against a clerk of court for omitting to index a judgment, because such is governed by § 3447, providing that actions against officers for neglect of official duty must be brought within three years. As bearing upon this, see Ott v. Hood, 152 Wis. 97, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 524, 139 N. W. 762, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 636; Cornell v. Edsen, 78 Wash. 662, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 279, 139 Pac. 602.

Appellant's contention, as we understand it, is that his alleged cause of action itself was concealed by the alleged fraud of the defendant in stating that the original injury was but temporary. Without taking the time to review plaintiff's citations, the import of them is that the cause of action was itself concealed, as in Mullen v. Callanan, supra, where, at page 379 of 167 L.R.A.1918C.

Iowa, it was said: "But, conceding that it might have been brought either at law or in equity, or that a court of law alone had jurisdiction, still the action is not barred, because the cause thereof was deliberately concealed from plaintiff."

So in the Cress Case, where there was no knowledge by plaintiff that there were to be commissions in a land trade, and defendants falsely told plaintiffs there were to be no commissions. We said in Cole v. Charles City Nat. Bank, 114 Iowa, 632, at page 635, 87 N. W. 672, referring to Cook v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 81 Iowa, 551, 9 L.R.A. 764, 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 383, 25 Am. St. Rep. 512, 46 N. W. 1080, one of plaintiff's citations: "It is there stated that the statute does not begin to run, where a cause of action is fraudulently concealed, until the facts are discovered by plaintiff."

In McKay v. McCarthy, 146 Iowa, 546, 551, 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 911, 123 N. W. 757, we said of that case: "It is not alleged that the cause of action was concealed by defendant, and, for this reason . . . Boomer v. French, 40 Iowa, 601, and Carrier v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 79 Iowa, 80, 6 L.R.A. 799, 44 N. W. 203, are not in point."

The last two citations are among those cited by appellant in this case. In the instant case, was the plaintiff's cause of action concealed by the statement of the defendant that the original burning was but temporary and was of no particular consequence? Plaintiff alleges that he was burned in 1901, and, as he alleges, by the negligence of the defendant, and that defendant fraudulently concealed the true effect produced by the use of the X-ray machine. This fact was known to plaintiff and his parents. All damages which subsequently developed are traceable to and based upon that act. By the original act plaintiff was injured, and, as the petition alleges, by the negligence of the defendant. He would have been entitled to some damage at that time, and, if it be true that cancer necessarily and in all cases is the result of such burning, or if cancer is the probable result, such fact could be shown as bearing upon the question of damages in an action for the original injury. If cancer is not the necessary or probable result of such burning, then, as before stated, defendant's statement would be more or less of an opinion, and in that case the fact that later and in 1912 a cancerous condition did develop and plaintiff's damages might thereby be increased, this would not constitute a new cause of action. It would seem, then, that plaintiff's cause of action accrued at the time of the original injury. In Gustin v.

Jefferson County, 15 Iowa, 158, it was held that the Statute of Limitations as to actions for damages resulting from injuries to the person commences to run from the time the injury is done, and not from the time the party injured becomes fully advised of the extent thereof. See also Steel v. Bryant, 49 Iowa, 116; Garrett v. Bicklin, 78 Iowa, 115, 122, 42 N. W. 621. In the Steel Case it was said: "The time when the action accrued on the bond is the time when it accrues for the negligent act. It is true that the negligent act had been committed before that time, but there was no immediate injury or damage, nor does the law imply there was any. The injury and damage were consequential, depending on the happening of certain things in the future."

In Miller v. Lesser, 71 Iowa, 147, 32 N. W. 250, it was held that an action upon an unwritten contract against one who had removed to Iowa and had lived here for five years after the cause of action had accrued was barred by the Statute of Limitations, notwithstanding the defendant had lived here under an assumed name, and plaintiff, by the exercise of diligence, was not able to discover his place of residence, on the ground that the case was not brought within any of the exceptions to the Statute of Limitations of Actions. See also St. Paul Title & T. Co. v. Stensgaard, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 741, and note (162 Cal. 178, 121 Pac. 731). In the note to Aachen & M. F. Ins. Co. v. Morton, 15 L.R.A. (N.S.) at page 161, are a number of cases bearing upon the question as to when the Statute of Limitations begins to run in cases involving breaches of professional duty or malpractice by physicians and surgeons. One of these is Fronce v. Nichols, 22 Ohio C. C. 539, 12 Ohio C. D. 472, where the damage complained of was occasioned by the malpractice of a physician, and it was held that it is the breach of duty that gives rise to the action and causes it to accrue, and not knowledge of the fact evidenced by resulting injury. Also Miller v. Ryerson, 22 Ont. Rep. 369, where it was held that under a statute providing that physicians should not be liable to any action for malpractice unless commenced within one year from the date of the termination of the professional services, an action against the physician for the alleged malpractice was barred within one year from the time the services were rendered, and that the Statute of Limitations began to run from that time, and not from the time the effects of the treatment developed. And in Fadden v. Satterlee (C. C.) 43 Fed. 568, holding that the statute as to actions for personal injuries begins to run at the time the injury is received, although its results may not be then fully developed. In Wilcox v. Plummer, 4 Pet. 172, 7 L. ed. 821, cited in 12 L.R.A. (N.S.) at 1005, an action against an attorney for negligence, it was said: "When the attorney was chargeable with negligence or unskilfulness, his contract was violated, and the action might have been sustained immediately. Perhaps in that event, no more than nominal damages may be proved, and no more recovered; but, on the other hand, it is perfectly clear that the proof of actual damage may extend to facts that occur and grow out of the injury, even up to the day of the verdict. If so, it is clear the damage is not the cause of action."

And in Gould v. Palmer, 96 Ga. 798, 22 S. E. 583, it was held that it was not a special damage or injury resulting from the unskilfulness of an attorney, but the breach of duty imposed by the contract of employment, which gives a right of action for damages sustained; and the Statute of Limitations in such a case, therefore, runs from the date of the breach of the duty, and not from the time when the extent of the resulting injury is ascertained. A number of other cases to the same effect are cited in the same note. In 25 Cyc. 1135 (18), we find this doctrine: "The test to determine when the Statute of Limitations begins to run against an action sounding in tort is whether the act causing the damage does or does not of itself constitute a legal injury; that is, an injury giving rise to a cause of action because it is an invasion of some right of plaintiff. If the act is of itself not unlawful in this sense, and plaintiff sues to recover damages subsequently accruing from and consequent upon the act, the cause of action accrues and the statute begins to run when and only when the damages are sustained. . . . But if the act of which the injury is the natural sequence is of itself a legal injury to plaintiff, a completed wrong, the cause of action accrues and the statute begins to run from the time the act is committed, be the actual damage however slight; and the statute will operate to bar a recovery, not only for the present damages, but for damages developing subsequently, and not ascertainable at the time of the wrong done; for in such a case the subsequent increase in the damages resulting gives no new cause of action. Nor does plaintiff's ignorance of the tort or injury, at least if there is no fraudulent concealment by defendant, postpone the running of the statute until the tort or injury is discovered. Where the doing of an act is attended immediately by resulting actual damage, the statute begins to run at once."

It is our conclusion that the plaintiff's alleged cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and that the court was right in sustaining defendant's demurrer to the petition. The judgment is therefore affirmed.

Tax — bank stock.

1. The tax contemplated by § 11,236 of the General Statutes of 1915, relating to taxation of national banks, state banks, and loan or investment companies, is a tax on shares of stock in the hands of stockholders, and not a tax on capital stock or assets, the property of the corporation.

For other cases, see Taxes, I. c, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — mode of assessment.

2. Shares of stock are to be assessed at their true value, which may or may not coincide with their bookkeeping value.

For other cases, see Taxes, III. b, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — deduction of real estate.

3. The assessed value of real estate generally, and not merely the banking house or office building, and real estate representing an investment of original capital stock, may be deducted from the value of shares of stock.

For other cases, see Taxes, III. b, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — land in other states.

4. No deduction may be made for real estate in other states owned by state banks, national banks, or loan investment companies.

Burch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

These actions involve controversies between state banks, national banks, and a loan company, on one side, and taxing officials on the other. The controversies relate to the assessment of shares of stock of the institutions named, and the deductions to be made from such assessments on account of investments in real estate in Kansas and other states. With the exception of some minor matters, the questions presented must be solved by an interpretation of the tax laws of the state, considered in connection with other laws, including statutes of the United States. The questions are of such character that they may be apprehended without a résumé of the pleadings. An abstract of the pertinent laws is appended to this opinion. For convenience in reference, numbers in brackets have been prefixed to each subdivision of § 11,236 of the General Statutes of 1915, which relates to a distinct subject. This section will be designated for brevity, the tax law.

The first question to be determined is, What is the precise subject of taxation reached by the tax law?

The first subdivision of the tax law provides that "stockholders" of state and national banks and of loan or investment companies shall be assessed and taxed "on the true value of their shares of stock." The second subdivision requires a return to be made, by a designated officer of the corporation, of "the amount and value of stock" held by each stockholder, together with "the value of any undivided profit or surplus." L.R.A.1918C.

The third subdivision requires the corporation to pay the tax "assessed upon said stock and undivided profits or surplus," and gives the bank a "lien thereon," but reserves a remedy against the stockholder. The fourth subdivision authorizes a deduction, on account of "capital stock" invested in real estate, to be made "from the original assessment of the paid-up capital stock." The fifth subdivision provides that bank stock and investment or loan company "stock or capital" shall not be assessed at a higher rate than other property. The sixth subdivision makes the act applicable to certain mutual insurance companies. The seventh subdivision provides that the assets, moneys, and credits of mutual insurance companies shall be subject to assessment and taxation. The first five subdivisions refer to state banks, national banks, and loan companies. The sixth and seventh subdivisions refer to mutual insurance companies, and in what follows the sixth and seventh subdivisions will be omitted from consideration, unless specifically mentioned.

It is not strange that this Joseph's coat piece of legislation should be confusing to taxing officers, especially those to whom the invisible, intangible entity called a corporation is still an enigma, and should be confusing to corporate officers and stockholders. It affords fine opportunity for legal dialectics and discursion. The fact is, the statute was the product of necessity, which limited the subject of taxation to shares of stock as the property of stockholders.

In the case of state banks, capital stock is the fund contributed by the stockholders to start the bank. It must not be less than a prescribed sum. It must be fully subscribed before a charter can be taken out, and the subscriptions must be paid in cash before a certificate authorizing the bank to engage in business can be obtained from the bank commissioner. The fund is divided into shares of $100 each. Each stockholder's subscription is of a certain number of shares, and certificates, called "certificates of stock," are issued to stockholders to evidence ownership of their shares. The original fund, called "capital stock," can neither be increased nor diminished, except under prescribed conditions and according to prescribed formalities. When paid in by the stockholders, the money belongs to the bank. On the books of the bank the cash account is debited, and the money is the property of the corporation, the same as if the corporation were a natural person. The bank is managed and controlled by a board of directors, and the stockholders have no voice in its business affairs. When the corporation begins doing business it has no money or property except the cash paid in on subscriptions to capital stock. The corporation buys a banking house with some of the money. The banking house is not capital stock. It is simply property purchased with money of the bank. The corporation proceeds to do a general banking business, and acquires notes and other instruments representing loans, acquires bonds, stocks, mortgages, and other securities, and acquires real estate and various other kinds of property. All this property belongs to the bank. The stockholders have no proprietorship in it or proprietary dominion over it. The property thus acquired, credits of various kinds, and cash and cash items in the vault, constitute the bank's assets or resources, sometimes spoken of in an economic way as its capital. They have all been acquired through the uses to which the original capital stock and its products have been put, but they are not capital stock. Capital stock is still and always the original fund subscribed by the stockholders at the inception of the organization, and stands as a liability on the books of the bank, instead of as an asset. The bank makes some money. Profits belong to the corporation, and can be disposed of by the board of directors only, not by the stockholders. The stockholders have no property in profits until the directors have declared a dividend. In order to create a fund to meet unforeseen contingencies and unusual losses, the bank does not distribute all the profits among the stockholders, but retains some of them. The fund so created is designated surplus. Profits not set aside as surplus or distributed in dividends are undivided profits. Surplus and undivided profits are the property of the bank. As the names indicate, they are not capital stock, but are something besides capital stock. After paying for the number of shares of capital stock which he has subscribed, the stockholder's right to claim money or property from the bank and its business is limited to sharing in such dividends as may be declared by the board of directors out of profits, and to sharing in the distribution of the assets of the bank when it winds up its affairs, after depositors and all other creditors have been satisfied. This right attaches to and is proportionate to the number of shares of capital stock which the stockholder owns. His shares are his personal property, and they may be bought and sold as other personal property, by the observance of certain formalities. They may be willed away, and in case of intestacy pass to his administrator as a part of his personal estate. He cannot sell or will away any part of the money or property which belongs to the corporation.

The foregoing explanation will serve quite as well for national banks and loan companies as for state banks. It is as simple and as elementary as it can be made,—so much so that it seems extraneous to a judicial opinion. It may be helpful, however, to inexperienced assessors, county clerks, and county boards of equalization, and perhaps others. There are indications that the legislative mind was not perfectly clear on the subject.

The state was admitted into the Union before the National Bank Act was passed by Congress. Article 11 of the state Constitution was devoted to finance and taxation, and § 2 of that article provided that the property of a bank, its notes, bills discounted or purchased, moneys loaned, and all other property, effects, or dues of every description, without deduction, should be taxed. The first tax law was framed according to that theory. Laws of 1860, chap. 114, Comp. Laws 1862, chap. 197. The exigencies of the Civil War led to the creation of the national banking system. The purpose was to supply a market for government bonds and provide a safe and elastic system of national currency issued on the security of such bonds. Government bonds were not taxable, the national banks were Federal agencies, exempt from taxation except so far as Congress waived the exemption, and the first act, passed on February 25, 1863 (Act Cong. Feb. 25, 1863, chap. 58, 12 Stat. at L. 665), contained no provision for state taxation. Such a provision was added by Congress in 1864, and appears as § 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9784). Concerning this act the Supreme Court of the United States has said (italics added): "This section, then, of the Revised Statutes, is the measure of the power of a state to tax national banks, their property or their franchises. By its unambiguous provisions the power is confined to a taxation of the shares of stock in the names of the shareholders and to an assessment of the real estate of the bank. Any state tax, therefore, which is in excess of and not in conformity to these requirements, is void." Owensboro Nat. Bank v. Owensboro, 173 U. S. 664, 669, 43 L. ed. 850, 852, 19 Sup. Ct. Rep. 539.

The result of the congressional legislation was to prevent application to national banks of state legislation taxing bank property other than real estate. In New York, state banks were taxed on their capital. An act was passed taxing shares of national bank stock to the stockholders. The act did not, however, tax the shares of state banks to the stockholders. The act was held void because it discriminated in favor of stockholders of state banks, notwithstanding the fact that state banks were taxed on their capital. In the opinion the Supreme Court of the United States said:

"The banks of the state are taxed upon their capital; and although the act provides that the tax on the shares of the national banks shall not exceed the par value, yet, inasmuch as the capital of the state banks may consist of the bonds of the United States, which are exempt from state taxation, it is easy to see that this tax on the capital is not an equivalent for a tax on the shares of the stockholders."

"The tax on the shares is not a tax on the capital of the bank. The corporation is the legal owner of all the property of the bank, real and personal, and, within the powers conferred upon it by the charter, and for the purposes for which it was created, can deal with the corporate property as absolutely as a private individual can deal with his own. This is familiar law, and will be found in every work that may be opened on the subject of corporations. A striking exemplification may be seen in the case of Reg. v. Arnaud, 9 Q. B. 806, 115 Eng. Reprint, 1485. The question related to the registry of a ship owned by a corporation. Lord Denman observed: 'It appears to me that the British corporation is, as such, the sole owner of the ship. The individual members of the corporation are no doubt interested in one sense in the property of the corporation, as they may derive individual benefits from its increase, or loss from its decrease; but in no legal sense are the individual members the owners.'

"The interest of the shareholder entitles him to participate in the net profits earned by the bank in the employment of its capital, during the existence of its charter, in proportion to the number of his shares; and, upon its dissolution or termination, to his proportion of the property that may remain of the corporation after the payment of its debts. This is a distinct, independent interest or property, held by the shareholder like any other property that may belong to him. Now, it is this interest which the act of Congress has left subject to taxation by the states, under the limitations prescribed." Van Allen v. Assessors (Churchill v. Utica) 3 Wall. 573, 581, 583, 584, 18 L. ed. 229, 233, 234.

The result in Kansas was that the legislature was obliged to conform the bank tax law to the Federal law, in order to avoid taxing the state's own banks out of existence. They could not compete with national banks, if stockholders were taxed on the full value of their shares, and, in L.R.A.1918C.

addition, the bank was taxed on all its property. Full equality between state and national banks was finally accomplished by the tax-law revision of 1876. (Laws 1876, chap. 34, § 22). The law was given its present form by the inclusion of loan companies and certain mutual insurance companies in 1891 (Laws 1891, chap. 84, § 1).

The distinction between the class of property owned by stockholders, known as "shares of stock," and the class of property owned by the corporation, called "capital stock," and sometimes called "capital," has always been recognized and enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States. Its decisions are authoritative because of the legislative purpose to conform the tax law to the requirements of the Federal law. A specious argument frequently advanced is that the shares of stock represent the capital stock, which in turn represents the property of the corporation, so that a tax return of shares by the stockholders, or the corporation for them, and a return of capital stock or property by the corporation, accomplish the same end, but by different methods. The fallacy of this argument is exposed by the decision in the case of New York v. Tax & A. Comrs. 4 Wall. 244, 18 L. ed. 344. The capital of a national bank consisted of $100,000, which was all invested in United States securities, exempt from taxation. In assessing the shares of stock to stockholders the assessor valued them at par, and made no deduction on account of the exempt character of the securities in which the bank had invested all its capital. A stockholder contested the assessment. The assessment was sustained on the authority of the decision in the case of Van Allen v. Assessors, supra. If the bank itself had been taxed, the exemption would have been allowed.

In the case of Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. ed. 645, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, the ownership of surplus was considered. The charter of a state bank provided for a tax on each share of capital stock, in lieu of all other taxes. A subsequent statute undertook to tax the banks' surplus. It was contended the statute violated the obligation of the contract expressed in the charter. In the opinion it was said:

"In Tennessee v. Whitworth, 117 U. S. 129, at page 136, 29 L. ed. 830, 832, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 647, Mr. Chief Justice Waite, in delivering the opinion of the court, says: 'That in corporations four elements of taxable value are sometimes found: First, the franchise; second, the capital stock in the hands of the corporation; third, the corporate property; and, fourth, the shares of capital stock in the hands of the individual stockholders.'

"The surplus belonging to this bank is 'corporate property,' and is distinct from the capital stock in the hands of the corporation. . . . Recognizing, as we do, that there is a different property in that which is described as capital stock from that which is described as corporate property other than capital stock, and remembering the necessity there is for a clear expression of the intention to exempt before the exemption will be granted, we must hold that the surplus has not been granted exemption by the clause contained in the charter under discussion. The very name of surplus implies a difference. There is capital stock, and there is a surplus over, above, and beyond the capital stock, which surplus is the property of the bank until it is divided among stockholders." 161 U. S. 147.

Considered in the light of its origin, and of its clear purpose to place state banks and loan companies on the same basis for taxation as national banks, the tax law becomes easy of interpretation, notwithstanding the loose phraseology employed. It would not be possible to levy a valid tax on the capital stock, the surplus, the undivided profits, or other property of a national bank, because of the restrictions contained in the Federal law. Consequently an intention to tax property of that character to state banks or loan companies cannot be imputed to the legislature. Neither may stockholders be taxed on property which belongs to the bank, and not to them; and the result is, the subject of taxation stated in the first subdivision of the tax law is, shares of stock belonging to stockholders.

The purpose of the list of stockholders required by the second subdivision of the tax law is obvious. The stockholders are the persons taxed, not the bank or loan company. The statement of the amount and value of stock held by each stockholder, together with the value of any undivided profits or surplus, is designed to facilitate the work of the taxing officers. The third subdivision makes the bank or loan company a responsible agent for the collection of the taxes due from the shareholders. The "tax assessed upon said stock and undivided profits or surplus," which the corporation is required to pay, is not any tax on stock, undivided profits, or surplus, because no such tax has been assessed. The tax is a tax on shares of stock, the personal property of the stockholders. The "lien thereon" given the corporation to reimburse it for payment of the tax is not a lien on stock, surplus, and undivided profits. The corporation already owns these in its own right. The lien is on the property of the shareholders, their shares of stock. This method of collecting taxes due from stockholders was discussed in the case of First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701, where the court said: "A very nice criticism of the proviso to the 41st section of the National Bank Act, which permits the states to tax the shares of such bank, is made to us to show that the tax must be collected of the shareholder directly, and that the mode we have been considering is, by implication, forbidden. But we are of opinion that while Congress intended to limit state taxation to the shares of the bank, as distinguished from its capital, and to provide against a discrimination in taxing such bank shares unfavorable to them, as compared with the shares of other corporations, and with other moneyed capital, it did not intend to prescribe to the states the mode in which the tax should be collected. The mode under consideration is the one which Congress itself has adopted in collecting its tax on dividends, and on the income arising from bonds of corporations. It is the only mode which, certainly and without loss, secures the payment of the tax on all the shares, resident or nonresident; and, as we have already stated, it is the mode which experience has justified in the New England states as the most convenient and proper, in regard to the numerous wealthy corporations of those states. It is not to be readily inferred, therefore, that Congress intended to prohibit this mode of collecting a tax which they expressly permitted the states to levy." 9 Wall. page 363.

The next question is, By what standard shall stockholders be assessed and taxed on their shares of stock?

The first subdivision of the tax law states that standard,—"the true value." The president, cashier, or managing officer of the corporation submits a list of the stockholders. Annexed to the names is a statement of the amount of stock, number of shares, and value of the stock held by each. That accounts for the capital stock. A further statement is made of the amount carried to surplus and the amount of undivided profits, shown by the books of the bank. If capital stock should be $100,000, surplus $45,000, and undivided profits $5,000, the book value of each share of $100 would be $150. That might or might not be the true value. There may be two banks on opposite sides of the same street, with the same capital stock and the same surplus. The true value of a share of the stock of one may be $200, while the true value of a share of stock of the other may be less than par. The value of all tangible assets of every kind, including the value of all real estate owned, should be considered. Intangible elements of value,—rights, privileges, good will, capacity and opportunity to achieve financial success, results of past business and the outlook for the future,—should be considered. In a word, the entire potentiality of the corporation to profit by the exercise of its corporate franchises should be taken into account.

The next question is, From what assessed value shall a deduction be made on account of investments in real estate?

The tax law says the deduction shall be "from the original assessment of the paid-up capital stock of said corporation." This is an impossibility. No assessment, original or otherwise, of the paid-up capital stock, is provided for, and no such assessment is made. For the reasons stated above, the meaning is, the deduction is to be made from the total valuation of all the shares of stock belonging to all the stockholders. To ascertain the personal liability of an individual stockholder, the remainder should be divided by the whole number of shares, and the quotient multiplied by the number of shares which he owns.

The next question is, What deductions on account of investments in real estate may be made? This is a compound question.

The tax law specifies real estate held by fee-simple title. This means full and unconditional ownership in fact. Should real estate be taken in satisfaction of a debt, it would make no difference that title was taken, for convenience, in the name of some officer or employee of the corporation. If a deed should be given the corporation in payment of a debt, it would make no difference that the deed was withheld from record, and the debt carried on the books of the bank as an obligation of the debtor. The real estate would belong to the bank by title in fee simple within the meaning of the law. Real estate deeded to the bank by warranty deed, but in fact for security only, would not be held by title in fee simple.

The Bank Act (Gen. Stat. 1915, §§ 514 and 568, with their amendments) limits the value of the banking house, furniture, and fixtures which a state bank may own to not more than one third of its capital stock, now one third of its capital stock and surplus. The purpose of the limitation was to put a stop to the expenditure of bank funds in the erection and extravagant furnishing of Grecian temples for the housing of state banks. The court is of the opinion the tax law should be construed in connection with this limitation on the L.R.A.1918C.

capacity of state banks to hold real estate, and that no deduction should be made on account of banking house furniture and fixtures in excess of the limited value. The Federal statute (Rev. Stat. § 5137, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9674) contains no such limitation on the capacity of national banks, and the Corporation Law contains no such limitation on the capacity of loan companies. The disability imposed on state banks does not affect them, and they are at liberty to deduct the full value of real estate of the character under consideration.

The state and Federal bank acts limit the length of time that real estate acquired in the ordinary transaction of business may be held. No deduction can be made on account of real estate held beyond the prescribed period. At the expiration of such period real estate should have been either converted into assets which may not be deducted, or else charged off.

An ingenious argument is made to the effect that under the provisions of subdivision 4 of the tax law the value of no real estate may be deducted except that into which the original fund derived from payments of subscriptions to capital stock has gone. The argument assumes that the term "capital stock" was used by the legislature according to its true signification. It has already been shown that the same term used in the concluding portion of the same sentence cannot bear that signification. Since the term was not used with technical accuracy in one part of the sentence, it is not likely the strict meaning was intended in another part. Harvester Bldg. Co. v. Hartley, 98 Kan. 732, 734, 160 Pac. 971. There are two general classes of property reached by taxation,—personalty and real estate. These classes are recognized by the tax law. An essentially different system of procedure is employed in the assessment and collection of taxes on each. In valuing the personal property taxed to the stockholder, that is, his shares of stock, the value of all real estate, from whatever funds derived, would necessarily be included. Preferring to tax real estate as real estate, to its owner, the corporation, according to the appropriate method of procedure, and not desiring to tax the same value twice, provision was made for deducting from the value of the personalty the included value of real estate.

The People's State Bank of Coffeyville, joined as a defendant in case No. 21,603, but in fact interested on the side of the plaintiff, claims the right to a deduction on account of real estate not located in Kansas. The statute does not provide for such a deduction. The object of the law is to provide revenue to meet the needs of the state government. The command of the law is that real estate, the value of which is deducted from the value of stockholders' shares, "shall be assessed as other lands or lots." This can apply to no real estate except that subject to the tax laws of the state. If the value of real estate outside the state were to be deducted, shares of stock would be taxed at less than their true value, without opportunity to recoup the abatement by taxation of real estate. The value of real estate in another state, owned by a national bank, may not be deducted from the value of shares of stock, unless the deduction be permitted to state banks. In a case which arose in Utah, it appeared that a deduction was allowed on account of real estate situated in that state, but not on account of real estate situated in other states. The Supreme Court of the United States, in disposing of the complaint of a national bank, said: "While real estate of a bank situated outside of the state of domicil is taxed in the state of its situs, yet the value of such real estate necessarily enters into and is considered in estimating the value of the shares of stock, and to deduct the value of the real estate would, to the extent of such deduction, reduce the real value of the shares, without a compensatory equivalent." Commercial Nat. Bank v. Chambers, 182 U. S. 556, 561, 45 L. ed. 1227, 1229, 21 Sup. Ct. Rep. 813.

It is insisted that the state bank should be accorded the same privileges as those corporations which are embraced within the provisions of § 11,164 of the General Statutes of 1915. Under that section capital stock is regarded as the equivalent of all the shares of capital stock issued and outstanding (Harvester Bldg. Co. v. Hartley, 98 Kan. 732, 160 Pac. 971), and is valued just as shares of stock in banks are valued. Capital stock value is considered as representative of all value-producing elements attending the corporate enterprise. Wyandotte County Gas Co. v. Spaeth, 83 Kan. 191, 109 Pac. 785. The value necessarily includes real estate and chattels which, if the property of an individual, would be listed and taxed in the usual way. If, when the corporation lists its capital stock, it specifies particularly the real estate and the chattels which it owns, and returns such property for taxation in the usual way, the value of such property may be deducted from the value of capital stock, except that real estate mortgages and chattel mortgages may not be deducted. If it be shown that real estate and personal property situated in another state have been duly listed for taxation there, such property may be deducted. The remainder is the value of the capital stock, for purposes of taxation. Stockholders are not taxed on their shares, and capital stock, valued in the manner described, is taxed as personal property to its owner, the corporation. It has already been shown that this method of taxation is not possible in the case of state banks, because of the necessity to conform the taxation of state banks to the taxation of national banks, and banks and loan or investment companies are expressly excluded from the operation of the section by the provision, "except such companies and corporations as are specially provided for by the statute."

The Interstate Mortgage Trust Company, the appellant in case No. 21,218, also claims the benefit of the privileges conferred by § 11,164 of the General Statutes of 1915. The appeal is from an order of the district court of Labette county, in which the company has its principal office, sustaining a demurrer to its petition praying for an injunction against the enforcement of an order of the county board of equalization which was approved by the tax commission. In its petition the company described itself as a loan company, so that it is embraced within the provision of the tax law placing state banks, national banks, and loan or investment companies in the same class. The provision of the state Constitution, requiring a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 228), does not forbid the employment of different methods of assessment and taxation for different classes of property. The method of assessing and collecting railroad taxes is radically different from the methods employed in assessing and collecting taxes on every other species of property in the state. Missouri River, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. v. Morris, 7 Kan. 210. Shares of stock in domestic corporations are taxed in one way, and shares of stock in foreign corporations in another. Hunt v. Allen County, 82 Kan. 824, 109 Pac. 106. In the opinion in the case last cited it was said: "The inequality in this case grows out of the different method provided by the statute for listing and assessing shares in the two kinds of corporations. Of necessity the legislature has adopted several different methods for the assessment of property of different classes and used in different kinds of business. The same rate of taxation was levied upon the plaintiff's property, and the same method of assessment was applied thereto, as is applied to the property of all other citizens similarly situated. So far no Solon has appeared in this or any other state of the Union who could devise a method, or any number of methods, of assessment and taxation for all the various kinds of property which would result in equal taxation in every individual case. As has been said, if absolute equality of taxation is required, there can be no taxation." 82 Kan. page 828.

This being true, the claim under consideration reduces to this: Is the classification of loan companies with state and national banks a reasonable classification? The question is answered by the company's petition, in which it stated that its sole and exclusive business is that of making loans on real estate securities, selling the same, issuing bonds and depositing real estate securities as collateral therefor, and receiving moneys and securities on deposit for the purchase of real estate mortgages. It is therefore purely a financial institution, dealing in money, obligations for the payment of money, and securities for such obligations, and as such is clearly in affinity with banks. Although not material to the decision, presumably the institution is within the jurisdiction of the banking department of the state, because of the use of the word "trust" as a part of its corporate name. Gen. Stat. 1915, § 2403.

The loan company asserts that double taxation will result unless the value of its real estate situated in the state of Oklahoma be deducted from the value of its shares of stock. The assertion is predicated on a misconception of the tax law. It is said that the tax law provides for the assessment of the capital stock of banks and loan companies. It has been demonstrated above that the tax is not on capital stock, but on shares of stock in the hands of stockholders, and that the two classes of property are distinct in fact, and dissimilar for purposes of taxation. In the opinion in the case of Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 134, 40 L. ed. 645, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456, it was said: "The capital stock of a corporation and the shares into which such stock may be divided and held by individual shareholders are two distinct pieces of property. The capital stock and the shares of stock in the hands of the shareholders may both be taxed, and it is not double taxation. . . . This statement has been reiterated many times in various decisions by this court, and is not now disputed by anyone." 161 U. S. 146.

It is said that taxation of the Oklahoma real estate and taxation of the shares is double taxation. The statute does not tax the Oklahoma real estate. The shares of stock are property of the individual stockholder, which the law requires shall be taxed at their true value. This value includes the value of whatever real estate the corporation owns, the situs of which is wholly immaterial. The loan company is in the situation of a Maryland corporation which desired to deduct the value of New Jersey real estate from the value of the shares of capital stock assessed and taxed to its stockholders. The court of appeals of Maryland disposed of the subject in an opinion which has received universal approval, and from which the following extracts are taken: "The separate shares of the capital stock of the corporation are authorized to be issued by the charter derived from the state, and are subject to its control in respect to the right of taxation; and every person taking such shares, whether resident or nonresident of the state, must take them subject to such state power and jurisdiction over them. Hence the state may give the shares of stock held by individual stockholders, a special or particular situs for purposes of taxation, and may provide special modes for the collection of the tax levied thereon. State v. Mayhew, 2 Gill, 487; First Nat. Bank v. Kentucky, 9 Wall. 353, 19 L. ed. 701. And while it is true that the shares of the capital stock of the corporation represent the capital stock, and everything of which the capital stock is composed, whether invested in real estate or other kind of property, the situs of the investment (other than the real estate of the company situated in this state) is wholly immaterial. . . . The true criterion, as fixed by the statute, is the true value of the stock, without reference to the question where, or in what manner or nature of property or security, the capital stock may be invested. Whether that be invested in real estate, or other property, beyond the jurisdiction of this state, the latter having control over the shares and their true value, the peculiar nature and value of the investment of the capital stock of the corporation, beyond the limits of the state, can form no proper subject for specific deduction or abatement from the true value of the shares of stock, when presented to be assessed for purposes of taxation. . . . Nor is there anything novel in the principle of such taxation." American Coal Co. v. Allegany County, 59 Md. 185, 193.

The loan company misconceives the meaning and application of the expression, "double taxation." It is not double taxation to tax taxable property within the state once. Shares of stock are taxable property. Real estate in Kansas is taxable property. Real estate in Oklahoma is not taxable property, and is not taxed. Shares of the loan company's stock, reduced in value by the value of the Kansas real estate, are taxed, and the Kansas real estate is taxed. That covers the taxable property within the state just once, and covers nothing more. "We say that the state in taxing stock may take into account the fact that the property and franchises of the corporation are untaxed, whereas in other cases they are taxed, and we say untaxed because they are not taxed by the state in question. The real grievance in a case like the present is that, more than probably, they are taxed elsewhere. But with that the state of Alabama is not concerned." Kidd v. Alabama, 188 U. S. 730, 732, 47 L. ed. 669, 672, 23 Sup. Ct. Rep. 401.

If the value of the untaxed Oklahoma property were deducted from the value of the shares of stock, a portion of this state's taxable property would escape taxation. Besides this, in this instance all taxable value not derived from tangible property would be wiped out. The loan company listed its capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits at par, $135,015.42. From this sum it deducted the value of its real estate in Kansas, $48,980, and claimed the right to deduct, to the extent necessary to cancel capital stock, surplus, and undivided profits, the value of its Oklahoma real estate, $206,882. With all its faults, the tax law is not so paradoxical.

Because the property taxed by the state of Kansas and the property taxed by the state of Oklahoma are of different kinds and belong to different owners, there is no double taxation, in the invidious sense. It is true that taxes on the corporate property in Oklahoma must be paid from funds which constitute a potential source of dividends to stockholders, and in that sense such taxes are an indirect burden on the stockholders. The burden, however, is not imposed by the laws of the state of Kansas, and is an incidental consequence of the voluntary election of the corporate managers to extend the business of the company beyond the jurisdiction of the state. This corporation derives its life and all its capacities and powers, including its capacity to employ capital stock, from the state of Kansas. Its shares of stock are valuable personal property, having a lawful situs within the borders of the state, and there is no more occasion for the state to forego taxes on such property than there is for the state of Oklahoma to forego taxes on property situated within its borders.

The loan company argues that if the tax law does not permit deduction of the Oklahoma real estate, it infringes the 14th Amendment of the Constitution of the United States. The argument is predicated on the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 49 L. ed. 1077, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 669. L.R.A.1918C.

The state of Pennsylvania taxed corporations on the value of their capital stock, and the question was whether or not the value of coal, having its situs in another state, could be included in the taxable value of the capital stock of a Pennsylvania corporation. It was held that the value of the coal should be excluded. The supreme court of Pennsylvania recognizes the distinction between property in shares of stock owned by stockholders, and property in capital stock, owned by the corporation and representing its assets, but declares the legislature of Pennsylvania has made no such distinction. Before the case arose the supreme court of Pennsylvania had held that a tax on the value of capital stock is simply a tax on the property of the corporation. Some of the decisions to that effect are cited in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, and there are many others. The Supreme Court of the United States was bound by the interpretation which the state court had given the state law, and the question was simply one of situs. The tax being a tax laid directly on property, it could not lawfully extend to tangible property outside the jurisdiction of the taxing state. The Supreme Court of the United States took care to guard its decision from misapplication to cases of the kind presented by the loan company's appeal by inserting the following discriminatory observation in its opinion: "Of course, the distinction between the capital stock of a corporation, and the shares into which it may be divided and held by individual shareholders, is borne in mind and recognized, and nothing herein affects that distinction. The question here is simply as to the value of the capital stock with reference to the assessment and taxation upon the corporation itself which issues it, and has nothing to do with the individual shareholder. Van Allen v. Assessors, (Churchill v. Utica) 3 Wall. 573, 18 L. ed. 229; Bank of Commerce v. Tennessee, 161 U. S. 134, 146, 40 L. ed. 645, 649, 16 Sup. Ct. Rep. 456; Delaware L. & W. R. Co. v. Pennsylvania, 198 U. S. 341, 354, 49 L. ed. 1077, 1082, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 673.

The legislature of this state has recognized the distinction here made. The tax law was framed to comply with the decision in the Van Allen Case and others of like character, and the tax is not a tax levied against the corporation on account of property which it owns.

Questions are presented by the Dearing State Bank and the Citizens' National Bank of Independence with reference to the course pursued in arriving at the sums on which their shares of stock should be taxed.

No fraud, or conduct so arbitrary or capricious as to amount to fraud, is made to appear, and the result of the conduct criticized may not be disturbed.

In case No. 21,603 the writ is allowed in part and denied in part. Issuance of the writ will be withheld. In case No. 21,218 the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Abstract of Laws.

Sections 1 and 2 of article 11 of the state Constitution read as follows:

"Section 1. The legislature shall provide for a uniform and equal rate of assessment and taxation; but all property used exclusively for state, county, municipal, literary, educational, scientific, religious, benevolent and charitable purposes, and personal property to the amount of at least $200 for each family, shall be exempted from taxation.

"Sec. 2. The legislature shall provide for taxing the notes and bills discounted or purchased, moneys loaned, and other property, effects, or dues of every description [without deduction], of all banks now existing, or hereafter created, and of all bankers; so that all property employed in banking shall always bear a burden of taxation equal to that imposed upon the property of individuals."

Section 11,149 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads as follows:

"That all property in this state, real and personal, not expressly exempt therefrom, shall be subject to taxation in the manner prescribed by this act."

Section 11,236 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads as follows:

"(1) Stockholders in banks and banking associations and loan and investment companies organized under the laws of this state or the United States shall be assessed and taxed on the true value of their shares of stock in the city or township where such banks, banking associations, loan or investment companies are located.

"(2) And the president, cashier or other managing officer thereof shall under oath return to the assessor on demand a list of the names of the stockholders and amount and value of stock held by each, together with the value of any undivided profit or surplus.

"(3) And said banks, banking associations, loan or investment companies shall pay the tax assessed upon said stock and undivided profits or surplus, and shall have a lien thereon until the same is satisfied: Provided, that if from any causes the taxes levied upon the stock of any banking association, loan or investment company shall not be paid by said corporation, the property of the individual stockholders shall be held liable therefor.

"(4) Provided further, that if any portion of the capital stock of any bank or banking association or loan or investment company shall be invested in real estate and said corporation shall hold a title in fee simple thereto, the assessed value of said real estate shall be deducted from the original assessment of the paid-up capital stock of said corporation, and said real estate shall be assessed as other lands or lots.

"(5) And provided further, that banking stock or loan and investment company stock or capital shall not be assessed at any higher rate than other property.

"(6) And provided further, that the provisions of this act shall apply to all mutual fire and life insurance companies or associations having assets, accumulations, money or credits, and doing business under the laws of this state.

"(7) And provided further, that such assets, money and credits held and under the control of such mutual fire and life insurance companies or associations shall be subject to assessment and taxation."

Section 514 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads as follows:

"Any five or more persons may organize themselves into a banking corporation, and shall be permitted to carry on the business of receiving money on deposit and to allow interest thereon, giving to the person depositing credit therefor; and of buying and selling exchange, gold, silver, foreign coin, bullion, uncurrent money, bonds of the United States and of the state of Kansas, and bonds and warrants of cities, counties, and school districts in the state of Kansas: of loaning money on real estate, chattel and personal security, at a rate of interest not to exceed the legal rate allowed by law: of discounting negotiable notes and of notes not negotiable, and to own a suitable building, furniture and fixtures for the transaction of its business, of the value not to exceed one third of the capital [stock] of such bank: Provided, that nothing in this section shall prohibit such bank from holding and disposing of such real estate as it may acquire through the collection of debts due to it."

This section was amended by chapter 79 of the Laws of 1917, in particulars not material here.

Section 568 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads as follows:

"Any bank may purchase, hold and convey real estate for the following purposes, but no other: First, such as shall be necessary for the convenient transaction of its business, including its furniture and fixtures, but which shall not exceed one third of the paid-in capital; second, such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its business; third, such as it shall purchase at sale under judgment, decrees or mortgage foreclosure under securities held by it: but a bank shall not bid, at any such sale, a larger amount than to satisfy its debts and costs. Real estate shall be conveyed under the corporate seal of the bank and the hand of its president or vice president, and cashier or treasurer. No real estate acquired in the cases contemplated in the second and third subsection above shall be held for a longer time than five years. If not sold before the expiration of said five years, it must be sold at private or public sale within thirty days thereafter, or charged off out of the earnings or surplus of said bank."

By chapter 76 of the Laws of 1917 the first subdivision of this section was amended to read:

"First, such as shall be necessary for the convenient transaction of its business, including its furniture and fixtures, but which shall not exceed one third of the paid-in capital and surplus."

Section 569 of the General Statutes of 1915, which went into effect March 11, 1907, reads as follows:

"Any bank now doing business in this state which owns real estate in excess of 50 per cent of its capital shall reduce its holdings by converting same into cash or other good assets, to an amount not exceeding 50 per cent of its paid-up capital, within one year after the passage of this act."

Section 11,164 of the General Statutes of 1915 reads as follows:

"That no person shall be required to include in the list of personal property any portion of the capital stock of any company or corporation which is required to be listed by such company or corporation; but all incorporated companies, except such companies and corporations as are specially provided for by statute, shall be required to list by their designated agent in the township or state [city] where the principal office of said company is kept, the full amount of stock paid in and remaining as capital stock, at its true value in money, and such stock shall be taxed as other personal property: Provided, that such amount of stock of such companies as may be invested in real or personal property which, at the time of listing said capital stock, shall be particularly specified and given to the assessors for taxation, shall be deducted from the amount of said capital stock: Provided, that mortgages owned by any such company on property, real or personal, in any other state, shall not be deducted: Provided further, that real or personal property in any other state, or county in this state shall be deducted if it be made to appear that the same has been duly listed for taxation in such other state or county in this state."

Section 5219 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9784) reads as follows:

"Nothing herein shall prevent all the shares in any association from being included in the valuation of the personal property of the owner or holder of such shares, in assessing taxes imposed by authority of the state within which the association is located; but the legislature of each state may determine and direct the manner and place of taxing all the shares of national banking associations located within the state, subject only to the two restrictions, that the taxation shall not be at a greater rate than is assessed upon other moneyed capital in the hands of individual citizens of such state, and that the shares of any national banking association owned by non-residents of any state shall be taxed in the city or town where the bank is located, and not elsewhere. Nothing herein shall be construed to exempt the real property of associations from either state, county, or municipal taxes, to the same extent, according to its value, as other real property is taxed."

Section 5137 of the Revised Statutes of the United States (Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9674) reads as follows:

"A national banking association may purchase, hold, and convey real estate for the following purposes, and for no others:

"First. Such as shall be necessary for its immediate accommodation in the transaction of its business.

"Second. Such as shall be mortgaged to it in good faith by way of security for debts previously contracted.

"Third. Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its dealings.

"Fourth. Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees, or mortgages held by the association, or shall purchase to secure debts due to it.

"But no such associations shall hold the possession of any real estate under mortgage, or the title and possession of any real estate purchased to secure any debts due to it, for a longer period than five years."

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant appeals from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff for injuries sustained by him in a railroad crossing accident.

The plaintiff, a boy ten years old, was riding with his mother in the rear seat of an automobile driven by his father. The father attempted to drive the automobile across the railway track in front of an approaching electric car. At the place of the accident, the track ran in a straight line for some distance north and south, and ran parallel with a public road near the railroad right of way. John Burzio, the plaintiff's father, with the plaintiff and the plaintiff's mother, left his home to go to Pittsburg, and, for some distance going north, traveled along the side of the defendant's railroad and saw the car with which the automobile collided, going north. The electric car and the automobile passed each other once or twice during the trip. At the place of the accident, a road running east and west crossed the railroad track. About 5½ feet west of the track and for 200 feet south of the east and west road there was a hedge which prevented a view of the railroad, and between the hedge and the railroad there was a growth of brush, weeds, and grass which, for a portion of the distance, prevented a view of the railroad from the public road running east and west. After turning east from the road running north and south, to cross the railroad track, and for about 15 feet from the railroad track, there was an unobstructed view of the track to the south for 200 feet or more. John Burzio turned east and attempted to cross the railroad. He did not see the car coming until he was on the track. He slowed down his car before he crossed the track. The electric car struck the automobile and injured the plaintiff. To recover for that injury, he brought this action.

The negligence of a railroad company in permitting obstructions on its right of way which obscure the view of the track from a highway crossing is discussed in the note to Cowles v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1067; and see later cases. Cherry v. Louisiana & A. R. Co. 17 L.R.A.(N.S.) 505, and Danskin v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 22 L.R.A.(N.S.) 232. The duty of a railroad to remove obstructions on right of way interfering with lookout from trains is treated in the annotation following Chesapeake & O. R. Co. v. Mason, L.R.A. 1916F, 130; and see later case, Barber v. Louisiana R. & Nav. Co. L.R.A.1917F, 802.

The plaintiff alleged that the defendant negligently permitted the growth of vegetation, hedge, weeds, and underbrush; that the defendant, on the occasion of the accident, did not give any warning of the approach of the electric car; and that the defendant failed to provide the electric car with good and sufficient brakes so that it could be quickly stopped, and failed to provide the electric car with a good and sufficient whistle or other signal with which to warn persons of danger. The jury, on questions requested by the plaintiff, made special findings of fact as follows:

"No. 1. Was there a growth of hedge or grass or weeds or underbrush on defendant's right of way, that obstructed the view to the south of one traveling past in an automobile on the road plaintiff was injured on, if injured, to that extent that an occupant of the automobile could not, with reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, have seen the approaching car until too near the crossing to avoid injury? Answer: Yes.

"No. 2. Was the defendant negligent in failing to keep its right of way and the approach to the track reasonably free from weeds, grass, and underbrush, thereby obstructing the view of cars coming from the south by persons going east in an automobile, until practically upon the track? Answer: Yes.

"No. 3. If you answer questions Nos. 1 and 2 in the affirmative, state whether or not such conditions contributed to plaintiff's injury, if any. Answer: Yes.

"No. 4. Was the defendant negligent in failing to give reasonable notice, alarm, and warning of the approach of its line car to the crossing in question? Answer: Yes.

"No. 5. Did the defendant's agents and employees in charge of the line car have notice and knowledge of the fact that an automobile with occupants was approaching the crossing in question? Answer: No.

"No. 6. Was the line car of the defendant equipped with a whistle for giving warning or alarm? Answer: No.

"No. 7. Was the line car equipped with air brakes? Answer: No.

"No. 8. Did the plaintiff, August Burzio, do anything that was careless or negligent at or prior to the time of his injury which contributed thereto? Answer: No."

On questions requested by the defendant, the jury answered as follows:

"Question 1. How fast was the automobile going [miles per hour] as it turned east and approached the railroad track? Answer: Eight miles per hour.

"Question 2. How many feet west of the west line of the railroad right of way was the hedgerow which plaintiff claims obstructed the view of the driver of the automobile? Answer: Five feet 5 inches.

"Question 3. How far south down the railroad track could the driver of the automobile have seen the approaching electric car after he turned the corner and just before he drove from a place of safety onto the railroad track, had he stopped the automobile and looked or listened for a car? Answer: Fifteen feet west of track. See 200 feet.

"Question 4. Was the bell or gong on the electric car rung or sounded as the car approached the road crossing? Answer: Yes.

"Question 5. How fast was the electric car going [miles per hour] when the motorman saw that the driver of the automobile intended to try to cross the railroad track in front of the electric car? Answer: Twenty miles.

"Question 6. What caution, if any, did the driver of the automobile exercise after the turn east was made and as he approached the railroad crossing to avoid a collision with the electric car? Answer: Slowed down.

"Question 7. What notice or warning, if any, did the motorman on the electric car have that the automobile was going to be turned at the corner and go east across the railroad before the automobile went around the corner and onto the railroad track in front of the electric car? Answer: Didn't have any.

"Question 8. What was the negligence, if any that caused the plaintiff's injuries? Answer: Not properly equipped.

"Question 9. How far south was the railroad car from the road crossing and point of collision when the motorman saw and realized that the driver of the automobile was attempting to cross the railroad in front of the electric car? Answer: Forty feet.

"Question 10. What did the defendant fail to do that it should have done that caused plaintiff's injuries? Answer: Didn't have car properly equipped with air brakes and whistle."

1. The defendant argues that the special findings of the jury show that the verdict should have been for the defendant, and that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment, and further argues that the answers to questions numbered 1, 2, 3, and 4 of those requested by the plaintiff are conclusions of law. This argument is not good.

The instructions of the court are not set out in the abstract. In the absence of the instructions, it is presumed that they properly covered the legal propositions embraced in each of these questions, and it is further presumed that the jury followed the instructions in answering these questions. Under proper instructions, these answers state facts, and not conclusions of law.

2. Under the evidence and under the findings of the jury, John Burzio was guilty of such contributory negligence as would prevent him from recovering any damages sustained by him in the accident, for the reason that he attempted to cross a railroad track without stopping, looking, or listening, although there was a place of safety from which his view of the track was unobstructed, and from which he could see the approaching car for a distance of 200 feet. Jacobs v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 97 Kan. 247, L.R.A.1916D, 783, 154 Pac. 1023; Wehe v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 97 Kan. 794, L.R.A.1916E, 455, 156 Pac. 742; Buntton v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 100 Kan. 165, 163 Pac. 801; Williams v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 100 Kan. 336, 164 Pac. 260; Moler v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 101 Kan. 280, 166 Pac. 488.

But, can the negligence of John Burzio be imputed to the plaintiff? The evidence does not show that the plaintiff exercised or attempted to exercise any control over his father while he was driving the automobile. A clear statement of the rule of law governing the recovery of damages under such circumstances is found in Corley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 90 Kan. 70, 133 Pac. 555, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 764, as follows: "The question presented is whether he is to be deemed chargeable with the negligence of the driver. The doctrine that one who voluntarily becomes a passenger in a conveyance thereby so far identifies himself with the driver that he cannot recover for an injury negligently inflicted by a third person, if the driver's negligence was a contributing cause, never gained much of a foothold in this country, and is now repudiated in England, where it originated. The history of its rise and decline is traced in a note in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 597, where cases are gathered illustrating all phases L.R.A.1918C.

of the subject. Save in a few jurisdictions the negligence of a driver cannot be imputed to a passenger who in fact has no control over him. Notes in 9 Ann. Cas. 408; 19 Ann. Cas. 1225; and Ann. Cas. 1913B, 684. See also Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 90 Kan. 51, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 820, 133 Pac. 558, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 639. This rule applies in the case of a guest who is riding with the driver for their mutual pleasure. 29 Cyc. 548-550; note in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 648; 7 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 447, 448. Where two persons are engaged in a common enterprise, using a conveyance for their purpose, each is said to be responsible for the acts of the other, but for this situation to arise each must have an equal right of control. 29 Cyc. 543; note in 8 L.R.A.(N.S.) 628. In the present case the jury found that the deceased was riding with the owner of the automobile as an invited guest on a pleasure trip. The defendant therefore cannot successfully invoke the doctrine of imputed negligence." 90 Kan. 73, 74.

In the Corley Case an automobile was negligently driven onto a railroad track and was struck by a passing train. In that case the plaintiff's husband was a guest of the driver of the automobile, and was killed in the accident. See also Leavenworth v. Hatch, 57 Kan. 57, 57 Am. St. Rep. 309, 45 Pac. 65; Reading Twp. v. Telfer, 57 Kan. 798, 57 Am. St. Rep. 355, 48 Pac. 134, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 138; Williams v. Withington, 88 Kan. 809, 129 Pac. 1148; Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 90 Kan. 51, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 820, 133 Pac. 558, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 639; Anthony v. Kiefner, 96 Kan. 194, 198, L.R.A.1915F, 876, 150 Pac. 524, Ann. Cas. 1916E, 264; Denton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. 97 Kan. 498, 155 Pac. 812; Angell v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 97 Kan. 688, 156 Pac. 763.

The negligence of John Burzio cannot be imputed to the plaintiff.

3. The defendant contends that it was not negligent, and that, therefore, it is not liable to the plaintiff for the damages sustained by him. This contention is good if the defendant was not negligent, but the contention is not good if the defendant was negligent. The petition charged that the defendant was negligent in permitting vegetation, hedge, weeds, and underbrush to grow on its right of way so as to obstruct the view of the railroad track from anyone traveling on the road running east and west. The jury found that the defendant was negligent in failing to keep its right of way free from weeds, grass, and underbrush. In Corley v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. supra, this court said: "Liability of a railway company for injuries occasioned by a collision at a highway crossing may be founded upon its negligence in allowing unnecessary obstructions to vision to exist upon the right of way." Syl. ¶ 1.

In the Corley Case, this court carefully examined the question now under discussion and reached the conclusion just stated.

4. It is urged that the findings of the jury were contradictory to each other and to the general verdict, and it is also urged that judgment should have been for the defendant. The special questions should be interpreted so as to support the general verdict rather than so as to overturn and destroy it. Solomon R. Co. v. Jones, 34 Kan. 443, 8 Pac. 730; Union P. R. Co. v. Fray, 43 Kan. 750, 23 Pac. 1039; Jackson v. Linnington, 47 Kan. 396, 27 Am. St. Rep. 300, 28 Pac. 173; Kansas City v. Slangstrom, 53 Kan. 431, 30 Pac. 706; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Swarts, 58 Kan. 235, 244, 48 Pac. 953, 2 Am. Neg. Rep. 540; MacElree v.

Wölfersberger, 59 Kan. 105, 52 Pac. 69; Osburn v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 75 Kan. 746, 90 Pac. 289; Lewellen v. Kansas Natural Gas Co. 85 Kan. 117, 121, 116 Pac. 221; McClain v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 89 Kan. 24, 28, 130 Pac. 646, Ann. Cas. 1914E, 699; Orr v. Missouri P. R. Co. 98 Kan. 120, 123, 157 Pac. 421; Tarin v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. 98 Kan. 605, 608, 158 Pac. 874.

None of the special findings contradict, but all are consistent with, the finding that the defendant was negligent in allowing weeds, grass, and brush to grow on its right of way. That finding supports the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Multnomah County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover rent due and unpaid on a lease, payment of which was alleged to have been guaranteed by defendant. Modified.

Statement by Moore, J.:

This is an action by the Depot Realty Syndicate, an Oregon corporation, against the Enterprise Brewing Company, a California corporation doing business in this state, to recover $1,450 as arrears of rent reserved in a lease executed by the plaintiff to John Ralson, the payment of which sum is alleged to have been guaranteed by the defendant. A demurrer to the initiatory pleading, on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, having been overruled, an answer was filed denying the material averments of the complaint. The cause was tried without the intervention of a jury, and, when the plaintiff had introduced its evidence and rested, a motion for a judgment of nonsuit was interposed and denied. The defendant's

A guaranty like the one in suit is an absolute undertaking to pay a debt, and is not discharged by failure of the guarantor to exhaust his remedy against the principal debtor.

Weiler v. Henarie, 15 Or. 28, 13 Pac. 614; Delsman v. Friedlander, 40 Or. 34, 66 Pac. 297; Gile Grocery Co. v. Lachmund, 75 Or. 122, 146 Pac. 519; Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, § 170.

Moore, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is contended that, though the defendant may have been benefited by the contract which forms the basis of this action, a corporation cannot legally guarantee the performance of any condition, and for that reason an error was committed in overruling the demurrer. It is conceded that the defendant is engaged at San Francisco, California, in manufacturing beer, which product is disposed of at wholesale to saloon keepers, the payment of whose rent has, in some instances, been guaranteed by the officers of the corporation. The general rule that an ordinary corporation cannot become a surety is subject to the well-recognized exception that such legal entity has implied power and may encourage legitimate undertakings by advancing money, extending credit, or becoming surety for any of its independent agencies, when by doing so it is reasonably expected that the business in which the corporation is engaged will be advanced by such appropriate means. 3 Thomp. Corp. 2d ed. § 2207. Thus, in Winterfield v. Cream City Brewing Co. 96 Wis. 239, 71 N. W. 101, a headnote reads: "It is not ultra vires for a corporation organized to make and sell beer to guarantee the rent of a customer."

To the same effect, see Timm v. Grand Rapids Brewing Co. 160 Mich. 371, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 186, 125 N. W. 357; Blue Island Brewing Co. v. Fraatz, 123 Ill. App. 26; Holm v. Claus Lipsius Brewing Co. 21 App. Div. 204, 47 N. Y. Supp. 518; H. Koehler & Co. v. Reinheimer, 26 App. Div. 1, 49 N. Y. Supp. 755; Horst v. Lewis, 71 Neb. 365, 98 N. W. 1046, 103 N. W. 460.

The securing of saloon keepers who would stipulate exclusively to sell the defendant's beer tended to expand its competition and enhance the scope of its business, and, this being so, the corporation could lawfully guarantee the payment of rent of buildings occupied by its customers while keeping the terms of such agreement. No error L.R.A.1918C.

It is maintained that the alleged guaranty is not an undertaking for the payment of another's debt, but is, in effect, a contract for indemnity merely, which obligation is collateral, and no liability attaches until an effort has been made to collect from the principal, and, since the complaint contains no averments in respect to such matter, an error was committed in overruling the demurrer. A text-writer in discussing this subject remarks: "When, by the terms of the contract, the obligation of the surety or guarantor is the same as that of the principal, then, as soon as the principal is in default, the surety or guarantor is likewise in default, and may be sued immediately and before any proceedings are had against the principal." Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, 3d ed. § 110.

Thus, in Redfield v. Haight, 27 Conn. 31, the defendant's son signed a writing as follows: "And the said Joseph Haight hereby further agrees, in consideration of the premises, to assume, and does hereby assume, the payment of the liabilities and debts of the firm of Redfield & Haight; that is, the liabilities of the said firm contracted for goods, wares, and merchandise for said business, and the liabilities and debts of the said Edwin Redfield, contracted and incurred for goods for the said business so conducted by him alone, a schedule of which debts and liabilities is hereto annexed."

To this contract was appended, upon the same paper, a memorandum upon which the suit was brought, as follows:

In consideration of one dollar, to me in hand paid, I hereby guarantee the full and fair performance of the covenants and agreements mentioned in the foregoing instrument on the part of Joseph Haight.

Dated August 8, 1854.

Desire W. Haight.

It was held that the defendant's contract was not a mere indemnity, but an absolute guaranty, and that upon the breach of the principal's agreement the obligee could immediately maintain an action against the guarantor.

In Garey v. Hignutt, 32 Md. 552, it was ruled that a creditor was not required to exhaust his remedies against a principal before resorting to the surety for payment of a debt for which both principal and surety were equally bound.

In Geddis v. Hawk, 1 Watts, 280, it was decided that a creditor was not bound to resort to the principal for the collection of his debt in the first instance, but that he might sue and recover from a surety.

"Where a contract of suretyship is joint and not several, all the obligors must be joined as parties defendant. Where it is joint and several, all or less than all may be sued as plaintiff elects." Brandt, Suretyship & Guaranty, 3d ed. § 829.

It will be seen from an inspection of the undertaking hereinafter set forth that the person signing the writing stipulated that Ralson would faithfully perform all the conditions of the lease, thereby making the engagement of the guarantor the same as that of the principal. One of these obligations was to pay the rent reserved. The guaranty is therefore a joint and several express engagement to pay monthly in advance the sums of money specified. Thus, in Gile Grocery Co. v. Lachmund, 75 Or. 122, 146 Pac. 519, a headnote reads: "A guaranty is an absolute undertaking to pay the debt when due, and is not discharged by the failure of the creditor to exhaust his remedy against the principal debtor."

To the same effect, see also Weiler v. Henarie, 15 Or. 28, 13 Pac. 614; Delsman v. Friedlander, 40 Or. 33, 66 Pac. 297.

No error was committed in this particular.

The remaining question to be considered is whether any evidence was received at the trial tending to show that the defendant's agent was authorized to guarantee the payment of the rent in such a manner as to bind his principal, or whether it, by any act or omission of its officers, is liable for the payment of any part of the rent. It appears from a transcript of the testimony that the defendant on January 1, 1906, entered into contract with Henry Meister whereby the latter was appointed its agent and given the exclusive right to sell in Oregon the manufactured product of that corporation. Meister in March, 1906, with the defendant's consent, sold all his interest in such agency to C. B. Williams. Alex Sweek, an attorney of Portland, Oregon, testified as plaintiff's witness that he was present when such bargain was concluded; that U. Remensperger and P. Windeler, respectively the president and secretary of the defendant, were also there on that occasion and advised that it was not necessary to write a new contract, but that a transfer of Meister's agreement with slight modifications was sufficient; that thereupon the witness made on such writing the notations "O K," which is identified as indicating some of the clauses of the contract that were continued in force. In referring to the writing Mr. Sweek testified: "It was delivered to Mr. Williams as his evidence of authority, and the agreement between all of us was that the contract was to be handed to Mr. Williams, and he would have all of the authority disclosed by that contract, but no greater."

The original agreement was received in evidence and has been sent up with the transcript. An examination of the writing shows that clauses thereof numbered, 1, 2, 4, 5, and 6 have written at the left of each on the margin of the paper the letters "O K." The remaining paragraphs of the writing are not thus marked, but words and figures have been substituted in some instances instead of others as originally employed. The third clause has two crossed lines indicating that such paragraphs had been set aside so far as it related to Williams's authority. A red line is drawn through each word of the ninth clause, which was originally as follows: "It also authorizes and empowers its said agent to expend not to exceed the sum of $350 in fitting up a saloon for a person who will sell its beer for a term of years, upon the condition that, if the person so agreeing shall fail or neglect so to sell said beer to the exclusion of all beer for the time agreed, that is, keg beer, then the sum expended to become immediately due and payable."

The paragraph formerly numbered 7 has written at the left the figures 10, while the clause previously marked 10 is now numbered 11. A part of that paragraph, referring to the defendant and to Meister, conferring a right assigned to and intended to be exercised by Williams, reads: "And it further authorizes him to sign agreements and leases with saloon keepers and others buying said beer, for it and on its behalf, as its said agent and manager, hereby ratifying and confirming all that its said agent and manager for said territory may and shall lawfully do under this agreement."

The plaintiff herein, being the owner of storerooms in a building in Portland, Oregon, executed a lease thereof to Crane & Dewey at a monthly rental of $175 to November 1, 1910, $250 a month for the second year, $300 a month for the third year, and $325 a month for the fourth year, to expire November 1, 1913. This lease, with the plaintiff's consent, was assigned August 17, 1911, to John Ralson, who was to operate a saloon on the premises and sell exclusively the beer manufactured by the defendant. There was indorsed upon the assigned lease a memorandum which reads:

Portland, Oregon. For valuable consideration we hereby guarantee the faithful performance by the above lessees of all their obligations under the within lease.

[Signed] Enterprise Brewing Co.,

U. Remensperger, Pres.

P. Windeler, Sec.

The plaintiff executed to Ralson another lease of the premises for a term of two years commencing November 1, 1913, at the expiration of the original lease, at a monthly rental of $200. There was indorsed on this second lease the following:

Portland, Oregon, May 27, 1913. For valuable consideration we hereby guarantee the faithful performance by the within lessee of all his obligation under the within lease.

[Signed] Enterprise Brewing Co.,
by C. B. Williams, Agt.

Ralson, on January 1, 1915, was indebted to the plaintiff to the extent of $400 for the use of the premises during the two preceding months, and upon his promise to pay that sum in instalments the rent was, by agreement of the landlord, reduced to $125 a month from January 1, 1915, to May 1st of that year, while $150 a month was stipulated to be paid until December 31, 1915, thereby extending the term of the second lease two months. In a letter written by the plaintiff January 11, 1915, to the defendant and C. B. Williams, its agent, Portland, Oregon, the following language is found: "In the matter of the lease to John Ralson, which you have guaranteed, we desire to confirm by this letter the agreement which was arrived at in the interview a few days since between Mr. Ralson, your Mr. Williams, and the writer" (James D. Hart, the plaintiff's secretary), setting forth the terms hereinbefore stated. "By this reduction the opportunity to the tenant to make the payment without calling upon you is enhanced, and we have made the modification with the understanding that your guaranty will hold until said December 31, 1915, for any portion of the above total of $2,100 [the amount of the rent due and to accrue] that Mr. Ralson fails to pay."

A carbon copy of this note, accompanied by a letter written at the same time by Mr. Hart for the plaintiff, was mailed to and received by the defendant at San Francisco, California, January 13, 1915, but no response thereto was ever made.

Ralson paid the rent from January 1, 1915, to June 1st of that year. It is fair to infer, however, that he vacated the premises, for on July 2, 1915, the plaintiff wrote the defendant saying in part "that Mr. Ralson's place of business is closed, and that he is now in arrears in rent for No. 120 North Sixth street in the amount of $675," a demand for the payment of which was made. A carbon copy of this notification and a letter of similar import and demand were also mailed to the defendant at San Francisco, California. No response, however, was made thereto. Replying to a letter from plaintiff's counsel relating to the payment of the rent demanded, the defendant, on July 14, 1915, wrote that the matter had been referred to their attorney at Portland, Oregon, and to Mr. Williams, its agent, saying inter alia: "We are somewhat in the dark regarding the entire affair, and naturally wish to have some particulars, which will take up some time owing to the distance between us."

C. B. Williams, as plaintiff's witness, in answer to the inquiry, "What were the circumstances under which you signed the name of the Enterprise Brewing Company to the Ralson lease, Mr. Williams?" testified over objection and exception as follows:

Mr. Ralson was complaining continually about his rental of the premises down there being too high, and after a conference or two with Mr. Hart, and between Mr. Ralson and myself and Mr. Hart, the question came up about an additional lease, and the former rental was $325, and he agreed to reduce the rental from that time on to $200, and give us a new lease for an additional two years, and Mr. Ralson was going to close up right then if he didn't get something of that sort, some concession on the rent there, so in order to get the thing off as soon as possible, I signed the indorsement (referring to the guaranty of May 27, 1913) believing that I had authority. . . .

Q. Did you notify the Enterprise Brewing Company of your action in indorsing this lease?

A. I think so. . . .

Q. Did you ever receive from the Enterprise Brewing Company any objection of any sort to your action in that matter?

A. No, sir. . . .

Q. What is the fact, Mr. Williams, as to whether or not it is necessary in selling beer for breweries in this district to guarantee leases, in order to hold the trade?

Over objection and exception, the witness answered, Yes, sir.

Q. Did you do that in other instances than this one?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did the brewery execute other guarantees?

A. Yes, sir.

On cross-examination Mr. Williams testified that, having purchased Meister's agency, he continued the business in the name of the Enterprise Beer Agency, a corporation, that became the selling agent for the defendant, from which he received a salary and a commission, and that the defendant's beer was sold in Oregon only to the Enterprise Beer Agency. In answer to the question,

"And you were practically the Enterprise Beer Agency? the witness replied, "Yes, sir." Williams also testified that without the defendant's express authority he executed on its behalf a promissory note for $900, to evidence the purchase price of material that was used in erecting a building on a lot which he owned in Washington county, Oregon, and upon his conveyance of such premises to the defendant it paid off the note. This witness further stated upon oath that without consulting the defendant he signed attachment bonds on its behalf in actions to recover from saloon keepers sums of money due from them for the purchase of beer.

The defendant's counsel introduced in evidence the depositions of U. Remensperger and P. Windeler, from which sworn statements it appears that neither the defendant corporation nor its board of directors ever adopted a resolution authorizing Williams to guarantee a performance of the conditions of Ralson's lease, nor did such officers or the corporation which they represented own any stock in the Enterprise Beer Agency, and that while the deponents personally signed such leases no person was authorized to do so for them.

The foregoing is deemed to be a fair summary of all the material evidence received at the trial. It will be remembered that the clause in the contract which was assigned to Williams empowered him to sign agreements and leases with saloon keepers and others buying the defendant's beer. This language probably could not be construed as expressly authorizing the guaranty of payment of rent of a building which was used by a saloon keeper who exclusively sold the defendant's beer. Mr. Sweek, however, interpreted that provision of the agreement as conferring such authority and so advised Williams, who, as agent, signed the guaranty indorsed upon Ralson's lease and testified that he thought he notified the defendant of his action in the matter, and that no objection thereto was made by his principal. The uncertainty of Williams's testimony in this particular renders it problematical as to whether or not the defendant ever obtained such information.

But, however this may be, it did receive the letter written by Mr. Hart, January 11, 1915, for the plaintiff in relation to the guaranty, and made no objection thereto. A sense of fair dealing demanded of the defendant a prompt denial of Williams's asserted right to indorse Ralson's lease, if the authority had not been conferred and the corporation desired to evade the legal consequences of its agent's act. The defendant should not be permitted by its silence to speculate upon the possibility of Ralson's success in operating a saloon and his resulting ability to pay the rent reserved, but if he failed in this particular then to deny Williams's authority to indorse the lease. Currie v. Bowman, 25 Or. 364, 377, 35 Pac. 848; Finnegan v. Pacific Vinegar Co. 26 Or. 152, 155, 37 Pac. 457; Schreyer v. Turner Flouring Co. 29 Or. 1, 16, 43 Pac. 719; Silby v. Strong, 38 Or. 36, 42, 62 Pac. 633; Cranston v. West Coast L. Ins. Co. 72 Or. 116, 130, 142 Pac. 762.

As a corporation acts by its agents, the powers of its managing officers are coextensive with those of their principal, except in relation to matters over which the stockholders alone have control. 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 852. The defendant's president and secretary necessarily had sufficient power to adopt any reasonable means that might tend to advance the interests of the corporation, even without a resolution of the board of directors to that effect, and hence such managing officers could authorize Williams to indorse a lease or ratify his act in that particular. Calvert v. Idaho Stage Co. 25 Or. 412, 414, 36 Pac. 24; Moll v. Roth Co. 77 Or. 593, 601, 152 Pac. 235.

A careful examination of all the evidence convinces us that no testimony was received tending to show Williams was ever empowered to guarantee the payment of rent of buildings even when occupied by saloon keepers who had agreed to sell the defendant's beer exclusively. The fact that a red line was drawn through each word of the 9th paragraph of the Meister contract which was assigned to Williams shows that his authority was intended to be restricted. It appears from the depositions of the president and secretary of the defendant that neither of them knew, until about eight months prior to giving their testimony, and probably when they received Mr. Hart's letter of January 11, 1915, that Williams had undertaken to guarantee the payment of Ralson's rent. These sworn statements are not seriously controverted by the testimony of Williams, who "thinks" only that he notified these officers of his indorsement of the lease.

We conclude therefore that the defendant is not responsible for any part of the rent which was due January 1, 1915, for the preceding months of November and December, but that it is liable for the rent thereafter accruing and remaining unpaid, by reason of its failure to deny Williams's authority when notified by Mr. Hart.

The judgment will be modified by remitting the sum of $400, and the cause will be remanded, with directions to enter a recovery against the defendant and in favor of the plaintiff for $1,050.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, Moore, J., on March 5, 1918, handed down the following additional opinion (— Or. —, 171 Pac. 224):

In a petition for rehearing it is insisted that the defendant was under no legal obligation to reply to the plaintiff's letter of January 11, 1915, containing the information that the term of the lease had been extended two months from November 1st of that year, and the monthly rent of $200 reduced to $125 to May 1, 1915, and to $150 for the remainder of the term, which modification was made pursuant to an agreement with C. B. Williams, the agent of the defendant, with the understanding that its guaranty would continue until December 31, 1915, and that, when this court concluded the defendant's failure to answer such communication constituted on acceptance of the condition stated therein, the plaintiff was thus permitted to introduce evidence which had been manufactured for the occasion, whereby an error was committed.

When oral declarations are made by a party in the presence and hearing of his adversary, who is under no restraint and conscious of the charge thus imputed, asserting against him an obligation which might be enforceable or his commission of an offense, or limiting his title to property, or affecting him injuriously, it is reasonable to suppose he would promptly deny such positive declarations, if he desired to escape unfavorable inferences which might be deduced from his silence, and hence he is usually required hastily to refute such charges. 16 Cyc. 958. This rule, however, does not generally apply to written communications containing statements of facts, a failure to deny which is not construed as a tacit admission of the truth of the writing, and no unfavorable inference arises from such silence, except in cases when the party receiving the letter has invited it, or where there is reason to believe he has acted upon the information thus received, or when there has been sent with the letter bills showing a shipment of goods, which invoices have been retained without objection, or where money has been sent upon a condition stated in the letter and the sum has not been returned. Id. 960. As sustaining the legal principle thus stated, see State v. MacFarland, 83 N. J. L. 474, 83 Atl. 993, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 782; L.R.A.1918C.

These rules, however, have no application to the law governing the relation of agency. If a principal, when fully notified thereof, neglects promptly to disavow an act or contract of his agent in excess of his authority, such silence will usually be interpreted as an implied ratification, and particularly so if the failure speedily to repudiate such conduct or agreement might impose upon the other party loss or injury. 31 Cyc. 1276; 2 C. J. 505; Curtze v. Iron Dyke Min. Co. 46 Or. 601, 606, 81 Pac. 815:

"The rule," says Mr. Justice Bean in Reid v. Alaska Packing Co. 47 Or. 215, 220, 83 Pac. 141, "is elementary that when an agent, in contracting for his principal, exceeds his authority, the principal, upon being fully informed of the facts, must, within a reasonable time, disavow or disaffirm the act of his agent, especially in cases where his silence might operate to the prejudice of innocent parties; or he will be held to have ratified and affirmed such unauthorized act, and such ratification will be equivalent to a precedent authority."

To the same effect, see also 2 C. J. 504, § 124, and exhaustive notes on this subject.

Ratification by a principal of an unauthorized act of his agent has occasionally been grounded upon the doctrine of an equitable estoppel. A clear distinction, however, exists between an estoppel in pais and ratification.

"The substance of ratification is confirmation of the unauthorized act or contract after it has been done or made, whereas the substance of estoppel is the principal's inducement to another to act to his prejudice. Acts and conduct amounting to an estoppel in pais may in some instances amount to a ratification; but on the other hand ratification may be complete without any of the elements of an estoppel." 2 C. J. 469; 31 Cyc. 1247.

In the case at bar, it is possible the extension of the term of the lease and the reduction of the monthly rent might be regarded as creating an equitable estoppel, but however that may be, we rest our decision upon an implied ratification by the defendant of its agent's unauthorized assumption of authority, by failing, when fully notified thereof, promptly to deny his power to consummate the agreement.

We therefore adhere to the former opinion, and the petition for a rehearing is denied.

Annotation—Power of corporation organized for the manufacture and sale of liquor to enter into contracts of guaranty or suretyship on behalf of its customers or prospective customers.

Earlier cases considering the same question will be found in the note to Timm v. Grand Rapids Brewing Co. 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 186.

In upholding the contract of the brewing company guaranteeing the rent of its customer, DEPOT REALTY SYNDICATE v. ENTERPRISE BREWING CO. ante, 1001, adhered to the general rule, as evidenced by the cases collated in the earlier note, that such a contract is not ultra vires, since it is in furtherance of the guarantor's authorized business by inducing custom.

This rule was further adhered to in Halloran v. Jacob Schimdt Brewing Co. (1917) — Minn. —, L.R.A.1917E, 777, 162 N. W. 1082, which held that a guaranty of rent of one of its customers by a brewing company was not prohibited by the laws of the state. The prohibition, the court stated, goes only to an interest in the instrumentalities used and acquired in the conduct of the business as such by the retailer, and to an interest in the profits derived by him, and the brewing company in this case was not interested in the business which the lessees would conduct on the premises, and did not pay or guarantee their license bond.

And in Miller v. Northern Brewing Co. (1917) 242 Fed. 164, it was held, citing as authority Timm v. Grand Rapids Brewing Co. (1910) 160 Mich. 371, 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 186, 125 N. W. 357, that a guaranty of rent of one of its customers by a brewing company was within its corporate powers "to do all things incident to or convenient in carrying out the foregoing purposes," that is, to manufacture, produce, buy, sell, and deal in and with beer, ale, malt liquors, malt, ice, and other similar products, etc.

Where a brewing company has power to guarantee the obligation of others for a valuable consideration moving to it, it is not ultra vires of the authority of the president and manager of the brewery to guarantee the purchase price of a business in consideration of the purchaser's agreement to sell the brewing company's beer exclusively. Hagerstown Brewing Co. v. Gates (1912) 117 Md. 348, 83 Atl. 570.

Notes given to a bank for a loan, to a hotel company which maintained a bar, payment of which was guaranteed by a brewing company which sold beer to the hotel company and recommended the loan to the bank, were held, in First & City Nat. Bank v. McCrossin (1916) 145 C. C. A. 177, 230 Fed. 983, not to be invalid under the provisions of a statute "that all agreements or obligations of any person to buy or sell exclusively a product or output of beer or other malt or spirituous liquors of any particular person or corporation in any licensed place of business shall be null and void. Nor shall any person engaged in the manufacture or sale of spirituous, vinuous, or malt liquors be allowed to conduct a business for the retail of said liquors in his own name or in any other person's name, or to furnish money or fixtures for that purpose, and any agreement, lease, or mortgage made for such purpose shall be null and void," there being no dispute of the testimony of the president of the bank that the bank was in no manner a party to any agreement for the sale of any portion of the beer products of the brewing company; that he knew nothing of any such agreement, and that the loan was made regardless of the sale of beer. The court stated that the bank had the right to lend money to the hotel company notwithstanding it conducted a bar in connection with the hotel business, and the brewing company had, under the Alabama statute, the right to sell its beer provided it did not violate the exclusive provision.

On the other hand, in Lewer v. Cornelius (1913) 72 Wash. 124, 129 Pac. 911, it was held that, under a statute prohibiting a brewing company "to pay, advance, or loan or become surety for the payment for any other person of the license fee required by any state law, city charter, or ordinance," a note of a retail dealer payable to a bank, given to a brewing company for the purpose of soliciting a loan thereon to pay the retail dealer's license, will be void as against public policy, where "the payee knew the purpose for which the loan was desired; that it allowed its name to be used as payee of the notes 'with the view to and for the purpose of aiding and assisting said brewing company, and did so aid and assist said brewing company in evading and circumventing the law; that said promissory notes were taken by said bank as a cloak under which to hide the fact that said brewing company had, contrary to law, paid the license fee of defendant; and that the notes when signed were not delivered to the bank by the appellant, but were delivered to the brewing company, who delivered them to the bank."

EDWARD SAXY and Wife, Respts.

Execution — effect on estate by entirety.

A man has no interest in land held by entirety with his wife, which can be sold under execution for his debts, even since the passage of the Married Women's Acts. For other cases, see Levy and Seizure, I. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a decree of the Circuit Court of the City of St. Louis in favor of defendants in a suit to subject an alleged interest of the defendant husband in real estate standing in the name of the defendant wife, to the payment of a judgment debt due to it from the husband. Affirmed.

Statement by Roy, C.:

The plaintiff seeks herein to subject an alleged interest of defendant Edward Saxy in real estate standing in the name of his wife, the defendant Mary M. Saxy, to the payment of a judgement debt due to him from the husband. There was a decree for defendants, and plaintiff has appealed.

On September 3, 1891, certain real estate in St. Louis was conveyed to the defendants, they being then as now husband and wife, and taking said property as tenants by the entireties. In 1905, while the property was so held, the husband became indebted to the plaintiff. Thereafter, through an intermediary, the title was placed in the wife alone; and, still later, the property was sold, and the net proceeds were used in the purchase of the real estate now in controversy. The petition alleges that the title to both of said tracts was so placed in the wife alone in fraud of plaintiff's rights as such creditor, and prays that the husband's interest in the last-mentioned tract be subjected to the payment of plaintiff's judgment.

Roy, C., filed the following opinion:

The question as to whether an execution against the husband alone can reach any interest of any kind in property held by the husband and wife as tenants by the entirety has never been before this court. There are some dicta on the subject, which we will consider after a review of the common law and the decisions of other jurisdictions. The conflicting opinions in the decided cases, and the various reasons given therefor, convince us that no safe conclusion can be reached without a clear perception of what such an estate was at common law, and the effect of the statutes known L.R.A.1918C.

as the "Married Women's Acts" on such estates.

We will first endeavor to ascertain what an estate by the entirety was at common law, leaving out of view the effect on such estate of the power of the husband in the right of the wife (jure uxoris) to dominate her property. The estate was peculiar (Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 302), and partook, in many respects, of the nature of the marriage relation. Husband and wife took and held it not as separate individuals and by moieties, but as one person, each holding the whole of it. Stewart, Husb. & W. § 303; 4 Kent, Com. 362. The English court of chancery, in Jupp v. Buckwell, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 148, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 36 Week. Rep. 712, quotes Coke and Bracton as saying that in such an estate, "vir et uxor sunt quasi unica persona, quia caro una et sanguis unus." That is a plain statement that they are one person because "they are one flesh and one blood." 2 Blackstone's Commentaries, p. 182, says: "And, therefore, if an estate in fee be given to a man and his wife, they are neither properly joint tenants, nor tenants in common, for husband and wife being considered as one person in law, they cannot take the estate by moieties, but both are seised of the entirety, per tout, et non per my; the consequence of which is that neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor."

Warvelle on Real Property, § 111, says: "It differs from the estate of joint tenancy in that joint tenants take by moieties and at the same time are each seised of an undivided part of the whole. In the estate by entirety neither tenant is seised of a part, or moiety, but both of them have the entire estate; and as this involves in itself a physical impossibility in the case of ordinary individuals it necessarily follows that effect can only be given to the grant by regarding both tenants as constituting but one person. But this, in fact, is just what the law does, and as this unity of person is never recognized save in the case of husband and wife, the estate by entirety is confined exclusively to persons within the marriage relation."

There was incident to this estate the right of survivorship. But such survivorship was very different from survivorship in case of joint tenancy. 2 Blackstone, p. 184, speaking of joint tenancy, says: "This right of survivorship is called by our ancient authors the jus accrescendi, because the right upon the death of one joint tenant accumulates and increases to the survivors."

Warvelle, supra, speaking of tenancy by the entirety, says (§ 111): "Both would therefore be seised of the entire estate; neither could dispose of any part of same without the assent of the other, and upon the death of either the whole estate would remain in the survivor. In this latter respect while the right of survivorship gives to the estate an apparent resemblance to joint tenancy, it yet differs materially from joint tenancy, for the survivor succeeds to the whole not by the right of survivorship simply, as is the case with joint tenants, but by virtue of the grant which vested the entire estate in each grantee, or, in contemplation of law, in one person with a dual body and consciousness."

Stewart says (§ 306): "On the death of either, the other has the whole estate, continuing alone his or her former holding, and not taking by survivorship in the sense that a surviving joint tenant does."

In Garner v. Jones, 52 Mo. 68, it was said: "At common law a conveyance in fee to husband and wife, of real estate, created a tenancy by the entirety. Being but one person in law, they took the estate as one person, each being the owner of the entire estate, neither of whom had any separate or joint interest, but a unity or entirety of the whole. So if either died the estate continued in the survivor, as it had existed before,—an undivided unity or entirety. There was no survivorship as in joint tenancies, but a continuance of the estate in the survivor as it originally stood. The only change by death was in the person, not in the estate. Before death they both constituted one person, holding the entire estate, and after the death of either the survivor remained as the only holder of the estate."

In Thornton v. Thornton, 3 Rand. (Va.) 179, it was said: "But husband and wife have the whole from the moment of the conveyance to them; and the death of either cannot give the survivor more."

See also Cole Mfg. Co. v. Collier, 95 Tenn. 115, 30 L.R.A. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 921, 31 S. W. 1000; Kunz v. Kurtz, 8 Del. Ch. loc. cit. 414, 68 Atl. 450.

There could be no partition of such estate. Warvelle, Real Prop. § 111; Stewart, Husb. & W. § 306; 4 Kent, Com. p. 362; 1 Washb. Real Prop. § 913; Russell v. Russell, 122 Mo. 235, 43 Am. St. Rep. 581, 26 S. W. 677.

Neither could dispose of any interest in the estate without the other. Blackstone's language above cited is: "Neither the husband nor the wife can dispose of any part without the assent of the other, but the whole must remain to the survivor."

Warvelle, as above quoted, says: "Neither could dispose of any part of the same without the assent of the other."

4 Kent, 362, says: "Neither of them can alien so as to bind the other."

Upon being divorced the parties cease to occupy the relation of tenants by the entirety. The dissolution of the marriage relation dissolves the tenancy by the entirety. Russell v. Russell, 122 Mo. 235, 43 Am. St. Rep. 581, 26 S. W. 677. It will be noticed that such an estate was based on the unity of husband and wife, they being considered in all respects as equals so far as that estate was concerned.

We will now consider the estate or right, which the husband acquired jure uxoris in the property of the wife, and its effect on the estate by the entirety. 1 Bishop on Laws of Married Women says: "Thus, as we have seen, the wife's money and chattels in possession pass by the marital right to the husband."

2 Kent, 130, says: "If the wife, at the time of marriage, be seised of an estate of inheritance in land, the husband, upon the marriage, becomes seised of the freehold jure uxoris, and he takes the rents and profits during their joint lives."

Platt on Property Rights of Married Women, § 2, says: "The husband was entitled to the use during coverture of all the real estate acquired by the wife before and after marriage."

Stewart, in his work above cited (§ 146), says: "At common law a husband holds during coverture in right of his wife, she being merged in him, all her lands in possession, and owns the rents and profits thereof absolutely. This is called his freehold estate jure uxoris; it is often said to be an estate for the joint lives of the husband and wife, but this is a mistake, as it terminates with absolute divorce. It differs from curtesy initiate in that it is a vested estate in possession, while curtesy initiate is a contingent future estate, it is independent of birth of issue, is held in right of the wife, and is not added to or diminished when curtesy initiate arises."

And in § 306, speaking of estates by the entirety, he says: "During coverture, the husband has at common law his estate jure uxoris, with the right to the rents and profits; he holds the property subject to his control, use, and possession; only this estate for their joint lives can be aliened by him, or taken for his debts, or charged by him with a mechanic's lien."

In Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 302, it was said concerning estates by the entirety: "If, as already seen, the husband and wife became seised in entirety of the undivided one seventh of the devised premises, the plaintiff is clearly entitled to a corresponding recovery of possession, if the husband had at the time of the sale any interest therein susceptible to execution. The great current of authority affirms such susceptibility; going only so far as this, however, that if the wife survive her husband, she, as such survivor, will be entitled to the whole. This theory, that the husband is possessed of a vendible interest, has for its basis that the husband, jure mariti, is entitled to the possession and usufruct of the wife's real estate during marriage, which right suffers no diminution or abatement by reason of his own interest in land whereof both his wife and himself are jointly seised. Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 692, 70 Am. Dec. 269; French v. Mehan, 56 Pa. 286; Bennett v. Child, 19 Wis. 362, 88 Am. Dec. 692; Freeman, Cotenancy & Partition, §§ 73, 74; 1 Washb. Real Prop. 4th ed. 672; Bishop, Married Women, 622; Steebler v. Knerr, 5 Watts, 181."

In that case the estate vested prior to the taking effect of the statute which destroyed the right of the husband to the exclusive possession and control of the land.

The proposition that the husband's right to control during his life the entire estate held by the entirety was by reason of the jus mariti was announced by the English court in Jupp v. Buckwell, L. R. 39 Ch. Div. 148, 57 L. J. Ch. N. S. 774, 59 L. T. N. S. 129, 36 Week. Rep. 712, and that case is cited with approval by the Canadian court in Re Wilson, 20 Ont. Rep. 397. As is said by Stewart, supra, this interest of the husband jure uxoris in the wife's property is different from the curtesy estate. The one is enjoyed during the life of the wife, in her right (or wrong), and terminates with her death; the other is enjoyed in possession only after her death. It, like dower, is held by right of the marriage, but not in the right of the spouse. We thus see that it was the marital right, and it alone, which gave the husband the power to appropriate absolutely the personal chattels of the wife, and gave him a freehold estate for their joint lives in her lands, including those held by them as tenants by the entireties. Independent of that marital right he had no interest in her property that he could himself dispose of, or that was vendible under an execution against him alone, except his curtesy estate, concerning which we will say nothing further. This freehold estate of the husband in the lands of the wife and in estates held by the entireties was based on the idea of the unity of husband and wife, but a very different kind of unity from that unity of equals above described. The estate of the husband jure uxoris had for its very foundation the idea that husband and wife were one because she was merged in him, and L.R.A.1918C.

he held the rights of both, and could act for both, regardless of her wishes.

We will now consider the effect of the legislation which is spoken of as the "Married Women's Acts." The verbiage of those acts varies in different states, in Canada and in England. Doubtless the results reached in some of the cases are by reason of some peculiar provision of the statute under consideration. For the purpose of this case we shall treat them all as being the same as ours, unless some reason to the contrary appears. In some states the estate by the entirety has been judicially repudiated. Whittlesey v. Fuller, 11 Conn. 337; Miles v. Fisher, 10 Ohio, 1, 36 Am. Dec. 61; Wilson v. Fleming, 13 Ohio, 68; Kerner v. McDonald, 60 Neb. 663, 83 Am. St. Rep. 550, 84 N. W. 92. In two states there are statutes which destroy the rule that a conveyance of land to husband and wife, of itself and without further provision, creates an estate by the entireties. Bassler v. Rewodlinski, 130 Wis. 26, 7 L.R.A.(N.S.) 701, 109 N. W. 1032; Wilson v. Wilson, 43 Minn. 398, 45 N. W. 710. In the following states it is held that the "Married Women's Acts have in effect abolished such estates: Donegan v. Donegan, 103 Ala. 488, 49 Am. St. Rep. 53, 15 So. 823; Re Robinson, 88 Me. 17, 30 L.R.A. 331, 51 Am. St. Rep. 367, 33 Atl. 652; Green v. Cannady, 77 S. C. 193, 57 S. E. 832; also in England, Jupp v. Buckwell, supra; and in Canada, Griffin v. Paterson, 45 U. C. Q. B. 536 (loc. cit. 554). In others it is held that those acts have made husband and wife tenants in common with right of survivorship. Schulz v. Ziegler, 80 N. J. Eq. 199, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 98, 83 Atl. 968; Hiles v. Fisher, 144 N. Y. 306, 30 L.R.A. 305, 43 Am. St. Rep. 762, 39 N. E. 337. Some states hold that such acts have had no effect on the husband's right in lands held by the entireties. Pray v. Stebbins, 141 Mass. 219, 55 Am. Rep. 462, 4 N. E. 824; Morrill v. Morrill, 138 Mich. 112, 110 Am. St. Rep. 306, 101 N. W. 209, 4 Ann. Cas. 1100. In two states it is held that those acts have resulted in depriving the husband's creditors of the right to affect the interest of the wife during the existence of the marriage relation; but they intimate that the right of the survivorship of the husband can be sold for his debts. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Collier, 95 Tenn. 115, 30 L.R.A. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 921, 31 S. W. 1000; Simpson v. Biffle, 63 Ark. 289, 38 S. W. 345. All those cases which hold that such legislation has destroyed or changed estates by the entireties proceed on the theory that it has destroyed the unity of husband and wife. They overlook the plain fact that such acts are meant to destroy the unity of unequals, the foundation of the jus mariti, and to thereby restore to its full vigor the unity made up of equals, the foundation of the estate by entireties.

The doctrine most numerously supported by the decided cases is best expressed in Diver v. Diver, 56 Pa. 106, by Strong, J., who was afterwards a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. He there says: "But it is said the Act of 1848, by destroying the legal unity of the husband and wife, has converted such an estate into a tenancy in common; that is, that such a deed conveys a different estate from that which the same deed would have created, if made prior to the passage of the act. To this we cannot assent. It mistakes alike the letter and spirit of the statute, imputing to it a purpose never intended. The design of the legislature was single. It was not to destroy the oneness of husband and wife, but to protect the wife's property, by removing it from under the dominion of the husband. To effectuate this object, she was enabled to own, use, and enjoy her property, if hers before marriage, as fully after marriage as before. And the act declared that if her property accrued to her after marriage, it should be owned, used, and enjoyed by her, as her own separate property, exempt from liability for the debts and engagements of her husband. All this had in view the enjoyment of that which is hers, not the force and effect of the instrument by which an estate may be granted to her. It has nothing to do with the nature of the estate. The act does not operate upon rights accruing to her until after they have accrued. It takes such rights of property as it finds them, and regulates the enjoyment; that is, the enjoyment of the estate after it has vested in the wife. And the mode of authorized enjoyment is significant. It is to be as her separate property is enjoyed, as property settled to her separate use. The act, therefore, no more destroys her union with her husband than does a settlement of property for her separate use. To a certain extent she is enabled, but no more than is necessary, to protect her property after it has been acquired. We have held that she can convey her lands only by joining in a deed with her husband. Pettit v. Fretz, 33 Pa. 118. This is a clear recognition of the existing unity of the two. It need not be repeated that no greater effect is to be given to the Act of 1848 than its language and spirit demand. It is a remedial statute, and we construe it so as to suppress the mischief against which it was aimed, but not as altering the common law any further than is necessary to remove that mischief. To hold it as operating upon the deed conveying land to a wife, L.R.A.1918C.

making such deed assure a different estate from what it would have assured without the act, is to lose sight of the legislative purpose. Were we to do so, it would become in many cases a means of divesting her of her property, instead of an instrument of protection. In the present case, if it has converted the estate granted to Diver and his wife into a tenancy in common, it has taken from her her ownership and enjoyment of the entirety during her husband's life and her right of survivorship to the whole. On this subject the remarks of Chief Justice Lewis in Stuckey v. Keefe, 26 Pa. 401, are worthy of attention."

That language is a clear and irrefutable statement of the conclusion that the Married Women's Acts are not intended to weaken or destroy that unity of husband and wife which treats them as equals, but that they do destroy that unity of the two which considers the wife as merged in the husband. In other words, the purpose of such acts is to destroy the jus mariti, without affecting, in any other way, the estates granted to the wife alone, or to the husband and wife as tenants by the entireties. That doctrine has been indorsed in Kunz v. Kurtz, 8 Del. Ch. 405, 68 Atl. 450; Patton v. Rankin, 68 Ind. 245, 34 Am. Rep. 254; Baker v. Stewart, 40 Kan. 442, 2 L.R.A. 434, 10 Am. St. Rep. 213, 19 Pac. 904; Masterman v. Masterman, 129 Md. 167, 98 Atl. 537; Hood v. Mercer, 150 N. C. 699, 64 S. E. 897; Corinth v. Emery, 63 Vt. 505, 25 Am. St. Rep. 780, 22 Atl. 618. Thus we have seen that, at common law, and independently of the jus mariti, neither husband nor wife could, without the concurrence of the other, bind or dispose of any interest in the estate. They could not have partition. On the death of one, the other continued to own the whole estate. There was no increase of the estate as in case of the survivorship of a joint tenant. In Jordan v. Reynolds, 105 Md. 288, 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1026, 121 Am. St. Rep. 578, 66 Atl. 37, 12 Ann. Cas. 51, it was said: "To hold the judgment to be a lien at all against this property, and the right of execution suspended during the life of the wife, and to be enforced on the death of the wife, would, we think, likewise encumber her estate, and be in contravention of the constitutional provision heretofore mentioned, protecting the wife's property from the husband's debts. It is clear, we think, if the judgment here is declared a lien, but suspended during the life of the wife, and not enforceable until her death, if the husband should survive the wife, it will defeat the sale here made, by the husband and wife to the purchaser, and thereby make the wife's property liable for the debts of her husband."

Leaving out of view for the present the decisions of the courts of this state, we conclude that where a judgment and execution thereon are against a husband alone, not including the wife, such judgment and execution cannot affect in any way property held by them by the entirety, nor can it affect any supposed separate interest of the husband therein, for he has no separate interest.

We will now consider the decisions in this state. In Gibson v. Zimmerman, 12 Mo. 385, 51 Am. Dec. 168, it was said: "They are each owner of the whole, but not of the half. They must both join in a conveyance. They are both necessary to make one grantor."

It was also there said: "And it is difficult to assign any good reason why survivorship between husband and wife is prejudicial to the commonwealth, or repugnant to the genius of republics."

The legislature, by § 2878 of our Revised Statutes, expressly excepts a conveyance to husband and wife from the provision that a conveyance to two or more persons shall be a tenancy in common, unless expressly declared to be a joint tenancy. In Hall v. Stephens, 65 Mo. 670, 27 Am. Rep. 302, above cited, it was said that the power of the husband over land held by him and his wife by the entirety was not affected by the Married Women's Acts. The only authority there cited was Ames v. Norman, 4 Sneed, 692, 70 Am. Dec. 269. There are three things to be said about Hall v. Stephens: (1) As we have above stated, only two states hold to that opinion, Massachusetts and Michigan. All the other courts of this country and of Canada and England, wherever they have spoken, have held that the Married Women's Acts have destroyed the jus mariti in estates by the entirety. (2) The opinion in Hall v. Stephens was a pure dictum, as the estate there vested before the date of the Married Woman's Acts. (3) The only case there cited has been repudiated as a dictum by the court of that state. Cole Mfg. Co. v. Collier, 95 Tenn. loc. cit. 123, 30 L.R.A. 315, 49 Am. St. Rep. 921, 31 S. W. 1000. The following cases were like Hall v. Stephens, in that the estate vested before the statutes affecting the husband's right went into effect: Atkison v. Henry, 80 Mo. 151; Moses v. St. Louis Sectional Dock Co. 84 Mo. 242; Wilson v. Albert, 89 Mo. 537, 1 S. W. 209; First Nat. Bank v. Fry, 168 Mo. 492, 68 S. W. 348. In Johnston v. Johnston, 173 Mo. loc. cit. 114, 61 L.R.A. 166, 96 Am. St. Rep. 486, 73 S. W. 202, attention was called to the fact that Hall v. Stephens was obiter dictum on the point here involved. L.R.A.1918C.

In Bains v. Bullock, 129 Mo. 117, 31 S. W. 342, it was held that the Married Women's Act of 1889 (§§ 6864 and 6869) did affect the wife's right in the estate by the entirety, and that it enabled the wife, without joining the husband, to sue any person other than the husband for the possession of the land. That case did not determine what effect the statute had on the rights of the husband and wife as between themselves. But it does say (129 Mo. loc. cit. 120): "But it is also true that the grant vests in each grantee the entire estate. The statute abolishes the legal unity between husband and wife, which gave rise to estates by the entirety, but the estate itself has not been abolished."

The question here involved was not in issue in that case, and the authorities were not there reviewed. We respectfully submit that if there had been such a review, it would not have been there said that "the statute abolishes the legal unity between husband and wife, which gave rise to the estate by the entirety." However, we have no special quarrel with that case. It holds, in effect, at least, that such estate still exists, freed by the statute from the jus mariti. Valliant, J., in Frost v. Frost, 200 Mo. 474, loc. cit. 483, 118 Am. St. Rep. 689, 98 S. W. 527, 528, said: "Under the facts of the case at bar it is not necessary for us to decide whether or not, under our Married Women's Statutes, the husband has been shorn of the exclusive right to the possession and control of the property held as an estate in entirety; it is sufficient to say, as we do say, that the title in such an estate is as it was at common law; neither husband nor wife has an interest in the property, to the exclusion of the other; each owns the whole while both live, and at the death of either the other continues to own the whole, freed from the claim of anyone claiming under or through the deceased."

We hold that, as a result of the Married Women's Acts, the husband, during their joint lives, has no interest in land held as tenants by the entirety that can be sold under execution for the sole debt of the husband.

The decree of the trial court is affirmed.

As shown in the notes referred to, it is the general rule that a judgment against one of the tenants to an estate by the entirety is not a lien upon any part of the estate, and gives to the judgment creditor no interest therein where the so-called Married Women's Statutes gives to married women the right to possession and enjoyment of their separate property, and hence, since estates by entirety exist only as to husband and wife, the entire property during their joint lives is free from judgment or execution liens against either of them. Parker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a suit by George H. Buss, appellee, against John H. Fox, E. F. Hardwick, and the Kemp Lumber Company, to recover a personal judgment against Fox, obtain a foreclosure of a mortgage executed by Fox, and determine the priority of claims between the appellee and Hardwick and the Kemp Lumber Company. The Kemp Lumber Company has perfected this appeal from L.R.A.1918C.

a judgment rendered by the trial court in favor of the appellee. The facts, as gathered from the pleadings, are:

That on March 16, 1909, John H. Fox executed his note for $8,000, and to secure the payment thereof executed a mortgage and delivered same to Buss. The note contained the usual provisions, with this addition: "In case of a default in the payment of any interest payment, then the whole principal sum shall become due and collectable."

The note provided that the principal sum should be paid on or before March 16, 1912. On June 11, 1909, the Wagon Lumber Company recovered a money judgment against Fox. It was assigned to the appellant, the Kemp Lumber Company, on June 29, 1910, and a transcript of the judgment was docketed in the office of the county clerk on December 14, 1911. The mortgage was not filed for record until the 22d day of April, 1915. On May 3, 1916, the appellant filed a suit to revive its judgment in the district court, and that suit was pending when the case at bar was instituted.

1. The trial court determined this case upon the demurrer of appellee to the answer of appellant. The first question is whether the Statute of Limitations had run against the note and mortgage at the time this suit was instituted. The appellant contends that the Statute of Limitations began to run from the date of the default in the payment of the interest specified in the note,—September 17, 1909,—and not on March 16, 1912, the time specified for the payment of the principal. The appellee contends that the acceleration clause in the note implies that the holder is vested with the option of declaring the note due and payable in the event of a default in the payment of the interest, and, the option not having been exercised, the statute did not begin to run until March 16, 1912. The trial court agreed with this contention. The question is one of first impression here. An examination of the cases discloses that such clauses have not been uniformly construed by the courts. The following statement appears in 17 R. C. L. "Limitation of Actions," § 161: "Where a mortgage is given to secure several notes which fall due at different dates, the Statute of Limitations commences to run as to each note at maturity, and is not postponed until the maturing of the last note. But according to some authorities, where a mortgage contains an acceleration clause to the effect that if there shall be a default of the payment of interest the principal sum secured shall forthwith become due and payable, the right of action to recover the principal ac-crues at once upon such a default, and the Statute of Limitations then begins to run against that right; it being said that such a clause is not a one-sided affair vesting a mere option in the mortgagee, but confers a right upon the mortgagor, equal with that given to the mortgagee, to insist upon it and receive whatever advantage he can from its enforcement."

In the same section it is also said that other authorities hold that such a provision merely gives the option to the holder to declare the principal sum due and payable upon a default in the payment of interest; the theory of such cases being that the clause is inserted for the benefit of the mortgagee, the option of such a character being a mere penalty. A collection of most of the cases on this subject will be found in the note to the case of Hall v. Jameson, reported in 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1190. See also Central Trust Co. v. Meridian Light & R. Co. 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 151. A well-discussed case holding that the clause is in the nature of an option is Core v. Smith, 23 Okla. 909, 102 Pac. 114. It is apparent that the reason for the adoption of that rule by that court is predicated upon the objection that the other rule makes it necessary for the holder of negotiable instruments containing such an acceleration clause to look elsewhere than to the instrument itself to determine when the same matures. We do not deem that such an objection warrants the court in making a contract for the parties. We prefer to hold with the rule announced by the court in the well-considered case of Snyder v. Miller, 71 Kan. 410, 69 L.R.A. 250, 114 Am. St. Rep. 489, 80 Pac. 970. The apparent reason for the adoption of that rule in that case was on account of the logic of the following statement contained in a case cited by that court: "But a more fundamental consideration is that the parties made the contract. . . . Its language excludes the idea that the creditor may or may not 'treat the debt as due.' It becomes due in fact. If an election were all that the parties intended, words appropriate to that purpose should have been used."

The same quoted case also contained this statement: "The question at last is one of construction of the language used, and that which makes it mean just what it says is not without reason or good authority to support it."

In Green v. Frick, 25 S. D. 342, 126 N. W. 579, the same doctrine was followed. The court said: "But to hold that a contract is optional which by its express terms is plainly absolute is unwarranted by any known rule governing the construction of contracts."

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the Statute of Limitations began to run in the case at bar upon the default in the payment of the interest instalment.

2. The second question presented is whether a judgment creditor of a mortgagor may plead the Statute of Limitations against a cause of action by a mortgagee against the mortgagor, the judgment debtor, the suit being on the note and to foreclose the mortgage. The trial court held that the defense of the statute was personal to the mortgagor, and not having pleaded it for himself the judgment creditor was in no position to plead it for him. In 17 R. C. L. "Limitations of Actions," § 331, it is said: "Although it is generally true that the Statute of Limitations is a plea personal to the debtor, which he may use or waive, as he pleases, and which one who is a stranger to him, standing in no relation of privity of estate with him, cannot use, yet where there is a privity between the party who could, if sued, plead the statute, and the party offering to plead it, the latter may plead it to save his property. Such is the case with heirs, vendees, unless the grant is fraudulent, and mortgagees. Broadly speaking, any person who claims title to or interest in any real estate may invoke the aid of the Statute of Limitations as against a claimant whose claim is prior in time to the person invoking the aid of the statute, where the prior claim has been barred by the Statute of Limitations."

A general statement of the doctrine will also be found in 25 Cyc. 1004, and in 19 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 184. In the last-mentioned work it is said that the rule is grounded upon privity of interest, and does not obtain with reference to strangers, although the latter, by being denied the right to plead the statute, may be seriously affected by the failure of the common debtor to plead the statute for himself. A majority of the cases sustain the view that a judgment creditor, in cases like that at bar, is in privity of estate with the mortgagor, his judgment debtor, and that he may plead the Statute of Limitations. In such cases it would seem on principle that no distinction can be made between the right of a judgment creditor to plead the statute and the right of a junior mortgagee. In the note to the case of Hopkins v. Clyde, reported in 104 Am. St. Rep. 737, the subject is fully discussed and most of the authorities cited. In Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185, 188, it was held that, when third persons have subsequently acquired interests in the mortgaged property, they may invoke the aid of the Statute of Limitations against the mortgage, even though the mortgagor may have elected to waive its benefits. See also Watt v. Wright, 66 Cal. 202, 5 Pac. 91; California Bank v. Brooks, 126 Cal. 198, 59 Pac. 302; Wild v. Stephens, 1 Wyo. 366. Brandenstein v. Johnson, 140 Cal. 29, 73 Pac. 744, and De Voe v. Rundle, 33 Wash. 604, 74 Pac. 830, hold that a judgment creditor may plead the Statute of Limitations in cases like the one at bar. North Dakota follows the California and Washington courts. Colonial & U. S. Mortg. Co. v. Northwest Thresher Co. 14 N. D. 147, 70 L.R.A. 814, 116 Am. St. Rep. 642, 103 N. W. 919, 8 Ann. Cas. 1160. On the contrary, in Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund S. D. Title & T. Co. v. Strawn, 93 Tex. 48, 53 S. W. 342, it was held that the holder of a vendor's lien could not plead the Statute of Limitations in an action by the holder of another vendor's lien to foreclose the same; it being said that the liens were of equal dignity, and that the privilege of the plea of the statute belonged to the vendee, and not to either of the lien holders. The same conclusion was reached in Welton v. Boggs, 45 W. Va. 620, 72 Am. St. Rep. 833, 32 S. E. 232, under similar facts. In Lamon v. Gold, 72 W. Va. 618, 620, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 883, 79 S. E. 728, the court said that strong argument had been presented to show that the doctrine of Welton v. Boggs, supra, was erroneous and contrary to the weight of authority, but a decision of the question was not made.

In a strict and technical sense a judgment creditor does not occupy such a relation to his debtor—the mortgagor—as to fall within the meaning of the word “privity,” for there is no succession to the property of the debtor until a sale under execution is had and the judgment creditor has become vested with the title thereof. But a majority of the courts have enlarged the meaning of the word, and consequently have held that there is privity between the two before there is an actual devolution of the title of the property owned by the debtor, who happens here to be a mortgagor. The extent to which some courts have gone in enlarging the meaning of privity is shown by the following statement in Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482: “But it is said that the plea of the statute is a personal privilege of the party, and cannot be set up by a stranger. This, as a general rule, is undoubtedly correct with respect to personal obligations, which concern only the party himself, or with respect to property which the party possesses the power to charge or dispose of. But with respect to property placed by him beyond his control, or subjected by him to liens, he has no such personal privilege. He cannot at his pleasure affect the interests L.R.A.1918C.

of other parties. His grantees or mortgagees, with respect to the property, stand in his shoes, and can set up any defense which he might himself have set up to the action, either to defeat a recovery of the property or its sale.”

We believe that the appellant occupied such a relation to the mortgagor that he was entitled to plead the Statute of Limitations in the case at bar.

3. The complaint alleges that the appellee is in possession of the land described in the mortgage, and is renting the same and applying the proceeds thereof to the payment of the mortgage debt, with the consent of the mortgagor. The appellee argues that this takes the case out of the statute. He cites 2 Jones, Mortg. § 715. That citation is to the general effect that neither the mortgagor nor one claiming under him can divest the mortgagee of possession, by ejectment or otherwise, until the debt is paid. The doctrine proceeds upon the equitable principle that “he who seeks equity must do equity.” A number of cases holding that the Statute of Limitations does not run against a mortgagee in possession, a doctrine closely allied to the proposition that is cited in the work of Jones on Mortgages, supra, will be found in the note to the case of Pettit v. Louis, reported in 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 356. The case itself held, among other things, that a mortgage, where the mortgagee is in possession, never becomes barred in the sense that the mortgagor or his grantee can ask a court of equity to quiet his title against the mortgage without himself doing equity by paying it. In 17 R. C. L. “Limitation of Actions,” § 359, it is said that the reason for the rule is that possession itself is prima facie evidence that the debt is not paid. Treating only the question as to whether the possession of the mortgaged land by the mortgagee, with the consent of the mortgagor, tolled the statute, we are forced to the conclusion that it did not. The reasoning upon which this conclusion is reached is that our Statutes of Limitations make no exception on this account. Section 3348, Code 1915, provides: “Those [suits or actions] founded upon any bond, promissory note, bill of exchange or other contract in writing, . . . within six years.”

Section 3356, Code 1915, provides: “Causes of action founded upon contract shall be revived by an admission that the debt is unpaid, as well as by a new promise to pay the same; but such admission or new promise must be in writing, signed by the party to be charged therewith.”

While the doctrine announced in some of the cases heretofore cited, viz., that possession by the mortgagee, with the consent of the mortgagor, is prima facie evidence that the debt is not paid, may be construed to go to the extent of holding impliedly that the consent of the mortgagor to the mortgagee's possession may constitute an admission that the debt is not paid, still under the circumstances of this case such an admission would not fall within the terms of § 3356, supra. The admission would not be in writing signed by the party to be charged therewith. The same thing may be said so far as reviving the debt by a new promise is concerned. But admitting all this, should we hold that the mortgagee's possession, with the consent of the mortgagor, tolled the statute, notwithstanding that the statute itself makes no such exception? In 17 R. C. L. "Limitations of Actions," § 33, appears the following: "In the early years after their enactment, an inhospitable reception was accorded by the courts to the legislative policies embodied in Statutes of Limitations. Among other means of evading the letter of the law, the courts were in the habit of implying exceptions at every opportunity. The courts in later years, while not inclined to deny or question the authority of the precedents importing into the statute certain exceptions, are usually unwilling to continue the practice of adding other exceptions which might be deemed wise, but which the legislature has not seen fit to make. The general principle recognized to-day for the construction of Statutes of Limitation is that unless some good ground can be found in the statute for restraining or enlarging the meaning of its general words, they must receive a general construction, and that the courts cannot arbitrarily subtract from or add thereto, and cannot create an exception where none exists, even when the exception would be an equitable one."

At § 190 of the same work, it is said: "As a general rule the courts are without power to read into these statutes exceptions which have not been embodied therein, however reasonable they may seem. It is not for judicial tribunals to extend the law to all cases coming within the reason of it, so long as they are not within the letter."

The doctrine is supported by numerous cases. In Bank of Alabama v. Dalton, 9 How. 522, 529, 13 L. ed. 242, 245, the court said: "The legislature having made no exception, the courts of justice can make none, as this would be legislating. In the language of this court in the case of M'Iver v. Ragan, 2 Wheat. 29, 4 L. ed. 176: 'Whenever the situation of the party was such as, in the opinion of the legislature, to furnish a motive for excepting him from the operation of the law, the legislature has made L.R.A.1918C.

the exception, and it would be going far for this court to add to those exceptions.' The rule is established beyond controversy."

In Butler v. Craig, 27 Miss. 628, 61 Am. Dec. 527, it was held that "no equitable exceptions are to be ingrafted upon the Statutes of Limitation, and that where there is not an express exception the court cannot create one."

In Tynan v. Walker, 35 Cal. 634, 95 Am. Dec. 152, it was contended by one party that the fact that no person was in existence competent to sue did not prevent the operation of the Statute of Limitations. The court said: "We have thus glanced at the condition of the law for the purpose of showing that the rule which the plaintiff has invoked has its foundation in judicial construction, and not in the language or general purpose and design of the statute, and that it is opposed to all the well-established rules by which courts should be guided in ascertaining and giving effect to the will of the legislature, and for the further purpose of justifying ourselves, if any justification be required, in adopting the same rule of construction in relation to the Statute of Limitations which we uniformly apply to all other statutes,—that is to say, to read it as it is written, without any arbitrary subtraction or addition to its meaning. The violation of this rule, as we consider, which we have noticed, can be accounted for only by referring it to the well-known hostility of the courts, at an early day, to Statutes of Limitations. That hostility no longer exists, and with it, in our judgment, its effects also should be allowed to pass away."

As the statute itself creates no exception to the running of the statute in favor of a mortgagee in possession, none exists.

The judgment of the trial court will therefore be reversed, with directions to overrule the demurrer to the appellant's answer, and it is so ordered.

Roberts, J., concura.

Hanna, Ch. J., dissenting:

I dissent from the conclusions reached on the second point by a majority of the court. I grant that a majority of the cases on the subject sustain the view that there is sufficient privity between a judgment creditor and his debtor to permit the former to plead the Statute of Limitations in an action by a mortgagee to foreclose a mortgage given by the judgment debtor. Those cases, however, have extended the meaning to be given the word "privity" beyond its strict and proper meaning, and are in conflict with this court's definition of the word as laid down in Smith v. Hill Bros. 17 N. M. 415, 134 Pac. 243, where we said: "It is more generally defined as a mutual or successive relationship to the same right of property."

The appellant in the case at bar, being a mere judgment creditor, who acquired a general lien on the property of his debtor, the mortgagor, occupied no mutual or successive relationship to the mortgaged property. His only right in the premises was to subject the property to a sale under his execution. He never stood in the shoes of his debtor, and I am unable to agree that he stood in privity with the debtor so as to be enabled to plead the statute in the stead of the debtor. The doctrine extended to its logical end will permit a second mortgagee to plead the statute against the first mortgagee, even though the debtor does not elect to plead it for himself. Therefore I dissent.

Annotation—Right of lien creditor to set up Statute of Limitations against other creditors of his debtor.

In general.

The questions whether a creditor may attack a conveyance by his debtor in payment of the claims of other creditors on the ground that their debts were barred by the Statute of Limitations, and whether the grantee in a conveyance attacked as fraudulent may plead the Statute of Limitations against the claim of the attacking creditor, are not within the scope of this note.

Cases like Callaway v. Saunders (1901) 99 Va. 350, 38 S. E. 182, in which creditors were permitted to plead the Statute of Limitations against other creditors on the ground that the estate of the debtor was being distributed in equity, are not included in this annotation, even though the creditors who plead the statute may have been lien creditors, for the reason that the decisions do not turn upon the incidental fact that the claims were secured by liens. The annotation deals only with the right of lien creditors, as such, to plead the statute against other creditors.

The general rules quoted from 17 R. C. L. by the court in Buss v. Kemp Lumber Co. ante, 1015, seem to have been adopted by all the courts that have passed upon the question here annotated. While all courts are agreed that, where there is privity between the debtor and the pleader, the latter has the right to set up the Statute of Limitations against other creditors of the debtors, there is not complete harmony on the right of a judgment creditor to so plead. The weight of authority holds that he has the right; that is, most courts regard a judgment creditor within the rule as stated.

By a mortgagee.

A junior mortgagee may plead the Statute of Limitations against the senior mortgagee, thus giving his junior mortgage the priority. Lord v. Morris (1861) 18 Cal. 482; Lent v. Shear (1864) L.R.A.1918C.

26 Cal. 361; Wood v. Goodfellow (1872) 43 Cal. 185; California Bank v. Brooks (1899) 126 Cal. 198, 59 Pac. 302; Hill v. Hilliard (1889) 103 N. C. 34, 9 S. E. 639; Scott v. Sloan (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 302, 23 S. W. 42; McClagherty v. Croft (1897) 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. 246.

And it has been held that a mortgagee of land belonging to the estate of a decedent may plead the Statute of Limitations against other creditors of the estate, whether the estate is solvent or insolvent. Dunford v. Clarke (1831) 3 La. 199.

Where a first mortgagee satisfies her mortgage of record, and many years later attempts to establish the fact that her mortgage was satisfied by mistake and that the second mortgagee had notice of the mistake, the latter, though not claiming that the mortgage debt was barred, has the right to plead the Statute of Limitations against her right to repudiate the discharge. Perry v. Fries (1904) 90 App. Div. 484, 85 N. Y. Supp. 1064.

The holder of a tax sale deed in possession of the property, even though it be assumed that his deed, because of imperfections, is merely a lien on the land, and not a title, can plead the Statute of Limitations against a prior mortgage on the premises, when the mortgagee is attempting to foreclose, even though the mortgagor has waived his right to plead the statute. Graves v. Seifried (1906) 31 Utah, 203, 87 Pac. 674. And the same rule will be applied where a personal judgment on the note secured by the mortgage is not barred by reason of the mortgagor's absence from the state. Boucofski v. Jacobsen (1909) 36 Utah, 165, 26 L.R.A.(N.S.) 898, 104 Pac. 117. In such situation a personal judgment should be entered against the maker of the note if he is in court, and the suit to foreclose the mortgage should be dismissed. On effect of mortgagor's absence from the state to toll the Statute of Limitations as against foreclosure proceedings against his grantee, see L.R.A. note to the Jacobsen Case.

While the facts before the court in Sanger v. Nightingale (1887) 122 U. S. 176, 30 L. ed. 1105, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1109, were not such as to actually require so broad a holding, since the prior mortgage had been foreclosed and the land sold at foreclosure sale, the court said: "The mortgagee of real estate in Georgia does not take the title to the property. The mortgage is only a security for the debt for which it is made. The title remains in the mortgagor. The cases in that state, as already intimated, go no further than to hold that a purchaser of the legal title, or possibly a mortgagee in possession, may, when sued, plead the Statute of Limitation as a defense to a prior debt or mortgage or encumbrance, made by the holder of the legal title."

The holder of two notes secured by a vendor's lien, and not barred by the Statute of Limitations, cannot plead the statute against the holder of another note secured in same way, but open to such plea if made by the debtor. Columbia Ave. Sav. Fund, S. D. Title & T. Co. v. Strawn (1899) 93 Tex. 48, 53 S. W. 342.

A first mortgagee who, in an action to foreclose his mortgage, has brought in the second mortgagee, cannot plead the Statute of Limitations against the latter, if the latter has not controverted the priority of the plaintiff's lien or any of his allegations, but has merely set up his own mortgage asking that it be foreclosed in the same suit as a subsequent lien. Tinsley v. Lombard (1904) 46 Or. 9, 114 Am. St. Rep. 844, 78 Pac. 895.

The holder of a tax sale certificate issued against mortgaged property, in a suit to foreclose the mortgage, cannot plead the Statute of Limitations against the mortgage, if the mortgagee has asked permission to pay the amount due to such holder. Neill v. Burke (1908) 81 Neb. 125, 115 N. W. 321.

By an attachment lien holder.

Likewise, the holder of a lien acquired by attachment may avail himself of the benefit of the statute against a previously acquired mortgage. Watt v. Wright (1884) 66 Cal. 202, 5 Pac. 91.

And it has been held that an attaching creditor who has been given leave to defend the debtor against a prior attachment may plead the Statute of Limitations. Sawyer v. Sawyer (1883) 74 Me. 579. The court treated this situation as L.R.A.1918C.

analogous to that arising in insolvency proceedings. It also argued that since the court had taken from the debtor the right to defend, the one who had been given that right should be allowed to defend as fully as the debtor could have defended.

But an attaching creditor of a legatee cannot avail himself of the Statute of Limitations to bar a bona fide debt owed by the legatee to the testator in his lifetime, where the legatee confessed judgment to the executor of the estate after the latter had been served with the process in the attachment. Sheppard's Estate (1897) 180 Pa. 57, 36 Atl. 422.

One who has no enforceable right or lien against property at the time it is placed in trust cannot plead the Statute of Limitations against the debt for which the trust was created, although he subsequently acquires a lien against the trust property. Ward v. Waterman (1890) 85 Cal. 488, 24 Pac. 930.

By a judgment creditor.

A judgment creditor can plead the Statute of Limitations against a prior lien acquired by mortgage with the result that the judgment lien is given the priority. Brandenstein v. Johnson (1903) 140 Cal. 29, 73 Pac. 744; Buss v. KEMP LUMBER Co. ante, 1015, De Voe v. Rundle (1903) 33 Wash. 604, 74 Pac. 836. Contra: Welton v. Boggs (W. Va.) infra.

The syllabus to Wild v. Stephens (1877) 1 Wyo. 366, indicates that a judgment creditor will not be permitted to plead the statute so as to bar a prior encumbrance of property against which the judgment constitutes a lien; but the decision turned upon the fact that the judgment was recovered against a partnership firm of which the mortgagor was a member, the court stating that "a judgment creditor undoubtedly has the right to plead the Statute of Limitations so as to defeat a prior encumbrance, if he is placed in a position to do so." It then holds that, since the judgment was not against the mortgagor individually, the judgment creditor was not in position to plead the statute, or rather that he was not a judgment creditor of the debtor. Aside from the syllabus the decision would seem to be slight authority for the proposition that a judgment creditor may plead the statute against a prior encumbrance.

And the judgment creditors of tutors may plead the statute that prescribes actions of minors against their tutors when four years have elapsed after the minors have reached their majority, even though the tutors do not plead it. McGill's Succession (1851) 6 La. Ann. 327; Viala v. Burguières (1867) 19 La. Ann. 149.

But in McClagherty v. Croft (1897) 43 W. Va. 270, 27 S. E. 246, the court distinguished between a general lienor—such as a judgment creditor—and a mortgagee who has a lien on the particular property in dispute, and held that the latter could plead limitations against a prior lien creditor, but refuses to decide as to the general lienor's right to do so. However, the court in Welton v. Boggs (1898) 45 W. Va. 620, 72 Am. St. Rep. 833, 32 S. E. 232, answered the query in the negative. In a note in the official report, the Croft Case is referred to and briefly discussed.

Pleadings.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage, an allegation that a third party claims some interest in the mortgaged property or some claim upon said premises or some part thereof, which claim or interest is unknown to the plaintiff, made for the purpose of compelling said third party to answer and have his claim adjudicated, does not show sufficient title to enable such third party to avail himself of the benefit of the Statute of Limitations against the mortgagee by way of demurrer, the mortgagor having made no claim in that respect. Blair v. Silver Peak Mines (1898) 84 Fed. 737.

And in the same kind of action a plea of the Statute of Limitations cannot be considered unless the pleader sets out also just what he claims his interest to be, so that the court may be able to judge as to the availability of the limitation plea. Corbey v. Rogers (1899) 152 Ind. 169, 52 N. E. 748.

And the same principle underlies the holding in Lincoln Mortg. & T. Co. v. Parker (1902) 65 Kan. 819, 70 Pac. 892, where the plaintiff alleged "that the defendant, the Lincoln Mortgage & Trust Company, is a corporation duly organized, existing and doing business under the laws of the state of Kansas, and that said the Lincoln Mortgage & Trust Company is or claims to be the owner of the fee simple title to real estate herein described, or has or claims to have an interest in or lien upon said mortgaged premises, the exact nature of which is to this plaintiff unknown, but plaintiff alleges that the said title, estate, lien, or interest of the defendant, the Lincoln Mortgage & Trust Company, whatever the same may be, is subsequent, inferior, and junior to the mortgage lien of this plaintiff."

And in Neill v. Burke (1908) 81 Neb. 125, 115 N. W. 321, the court acted upon the same principle. J. W. M.

Mortgage — lien for work — priority.

The lien authorized by § 266, Code 1915, for the expense incurred for repairs and work upon an artesian well, in preventing the waste of water by such well, does not take precedence over a prior recorded mortgage: the statute being silent upon the question. Such a lien is not a tax, based upon the theory of benefits, but is for the cost and expense of doing an act which it was the legal duty of the owner to do, and

ERROR to the District Court for Chaves County to review a judgment giving defendant's mortgage precedence over a statutory lien for expenses incurred for repairs and work upon an artesian well. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. C. O. Thompson and K. K. Scott for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. L. O. Fullen and W. A. Dunn, for defendant in error:

Even though plaintiff has a lien on the premises in controversy, such lien is inferior and subject to the prior mortgage of the defendant.

v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144; Cook v. State, 101 Ind. 446; Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700.

Roberts, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This writ of error was sued out for the purpose of reviewing the action of the trial court in holding that defendant in error's mortgage was superior to the lien authorized by § 266, Code 1915. This section of the statutes is a part of a chapter which regulates artesian wells, and authorizes the artesian well supervisor, therein provided for, to make repairs upon artesian wells, or to plug the same in certain cases. The section reads: "The expenses incurred for the repairs of work aforesaid shall become a lien on the land, where such well or reservoirs are situated, and upon such well or reservoir, and the artesian well supervisor within twenty days after the completion of said repairs or work upon any well or reservoir, shall file for record with the county clerk of the county in which said land, well or reservoir is situated, a statement of the expenses or the amount thereof, the name of the owner or the reputed owner of the land, well or reservoir, and a description of the land, well or reservoir, to be charged with the lien, sufficient for the identification, which claim must be verified by the oath of the artesian well supervisor."

The next section provides for the recording of the lien by the county clerk, and § 268 authorizes the well supervisor to foreclose the lien, and provides: "And the procedure therefor shall be the same as provided by law for the sale of real estate under foreclosure of mortgage."

The statute was construed by this court in the case of Eccles v. Ditto, — N. M. —, L.R.A.1918B, 126, 167 Pac. 726, and this writ of error is prosecuted by the well supervisor to review the action of the district court in that case in giving precedence to the lien of defendant in error's mortgage over the statutory lien. The mortgage was executed and recorded prior to the making of the repairs. In this state it is well settled that a mortgage is merely a lien on, and passes no estate or interest in, the mortgaged premises. Stearns-Roger Co. v. Aztec Gold Min. & Mill. Mfg. Co. 14 N. M. 300, 93 Pac. 706; Cleveland v. Bateman, 21 N. M. 675, 158 Pac. 648. The priorities of statutory liens are generally regulated by the statutes creating them (25 Cyc. 679), and where the statute authorizes the lien, and provides for its filing in the office of the county recorder, but is silent as to its priority, it takes effect from the date it is so filed, unless the statute makes it effective L.R.A.1918C.

from the time the work is commenced, or other act done; and it does not take precedence over a prior recorded mortgage or other lien, unless so provided by statute. A statutory lien cannot be given priority over a mortgage existing and of record before the enactment of the statute creating the lien. 25 Cyc. 679.

Some courts place the lien of an assessment, imposed by proper authority in return for special benefits conferred upon property by an improvement of a public character for the expense of making such improvement, in the same class as an ordinary statutory lien, such, for example, as a mechanic's lien, and hold that such a lien has only such priority as the statute gives to it. State ex rel. Ely v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 117 Ind. 251, 20 N. E. 144; Killian v. Andrews, 130 Ind. 579, 30 N. E. 700; Pierce v. Ætna L. Ins. Co. 131 Ind. 284, 31 N. E. 68; State ex rel. Vawter v. Loveless, 133 Ind. 600, 33 N. E. 622; Morey v. Duluth, 75 Minn. 221, 77 N. W. 829; Shaler v. McAlcese, 73 N. J. Eq. 536, 68 Atl. 416; and note to case of Baldwin v. Moroney, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 762. Other courts hold, however, that an assessment for local improvements is in the nature of a tax, and, when duly and properly made, is superior in dignity to all other liens on the land on which it is assessed. Richmond v. Williams, 102 Va. 733, 47 S. E. 844; Lybass v. Ft. Myers, 56 Fla. 817, 47 So. 346; and see note to Morey Engineering & Constr. Co. v. St. Louis Artificial Ice Rink Co. Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1200.

A special assessment for benefits is a form of tax, and is referable to the power of taxation (Page & J. Taxn. by Assessment, § 5), while an assessment (so-called for want of a better name) levied to reimburse the public corporation for the cost of performing some act which the owner of the realty assessed is bound by law to perform, but which he omits or refuses to do, does not rest upon any theory of benefits conferred, and is not necessarily a form of taxation. It constitutes an exercise by the legislature of the police power as distinct from the taxing power. Page & J. Taxn. by Assessment, §§ 9 and 89.

An assessment levied upon property in return for benefits, presumptively the property assessed to the extent of the tax, does not impair the security of the prior mortgage which the tax supplants; but an assessment laid, or a lien created, under the police power, in favor of a public agency, for doing something for the owner which he fails and refuses to do, and which the law makes it his duty to do, may not benefit the property upon which the assessment is laid or the lien created; and hence the lien should not be construed as having precedence over a prior recorded mortgage, unless the statute clearly gives to it such priority. The reason for the rule is obvious. Section 5504, Code 1915, gives to the mortgagee of real estate the right to pay the taxes on the real estate, where the owner fails and refuses to do so, and the taxes so paid may be recovered by the mortgagee under the lien of his mortgage. The assessment here levied not being a tax, the mortgagee would not be protected by his mortgage lien should he pay it off. Again, the holder of the prior mortgage is given no notice of the intended improvements upon the well, and has therefore no opportunity of protecting his security by making the repairs or plugging the well, nor would any such expense become a part of his mortgage debt.

We therefore hold that the lien authorized by § 266, Code 1915, for the expense incurred for repairs and work upon an artesian well, in preventing the waste of water by such well, does not take precedence over a prior recorded mortgage; the statute being silent upon the question.

The judgment of the District Court will therefore be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

Hanna, Ch. J., and Parker, J., concur.

Annotation—Priority over mortgage of statutory lien for work not beneficial to the property, done in the exercise of the police power.

A search has disclosed no case exactly in point on the question considered in ECCLES v. WILL, ante, 1022. It will be observed that in that case the court took the position that, where the statute imposing the lien for repairs made in the exercise of the police power was silent on the question of priority, the mortgage retained its superiority over the lien; and that it was not necessary to determine whether the legislature might expressly have provided that the lien should have priority over an existing mortgage.

The view taken in the ECCLES CASE, that where the statute creating the lien is silent on the question the lien does not take priority over an existing mortgage is in accord with the general rule declared in such cases as Sullivan v. Clifton (1893) 55 N. J. L. 324, 20 L.R.A. 719, 39 Am. St. Rep. 652, 26 Atl. 964; Easter v. Goyne (1888) 51 Ark. 222, 11 S. W. 212; Peter Barrett Mfg. Co. v. Van Ronk (1914) 212 N. Y. 90, 105 N. E. 811; and Parker-Harris Co. v. Tate (1916) 135 Tenn. 509, L.R.A.1916F, 935, 188 S. W. 54. In the Goyne Case it was said: "The statute under consideration does not evince the intention to give preference to the statutory lien, and, in the absence of a legislative intent to that effect, the courts have not, unless in exceptional instances, permitted the lien created by the statute to become paramount to a prior recorded mortgage." In the Van Ronk Case the court said that "it is one of the characteristics of contractual or statutory liens that they are subordinate to all prior existing rights in the property, while common-law liens which arise, upon consideration of justice and policy, by operation of law, attach, as a general rule, to the property itself without any reference to ownership, and override all other rights in the property." And to the same effect is Sullivan v. Clifton (N. J.) supra.

In Parker-Harris Co. v. Tate (Tenn.) supra, it was held that a lien given by statute upon an automobile for injury done by it did not have precedence over the rights of a conditional vendor of the machine. In this case the vendor's rights had attached prior to the infliction of the injuries but subsequent to the enactment of the statute, which did not expressly cover the question of priority. And on the general question of priority of statutory liens the court said: "By a long line of decisions, where a statute creates a lien, that lien, as contradistinguished from a common-law lien, is held not to take precedence of a prior contractual lien, where the creating statute does not clearly show or declare an intention to cause the statutory lien to override the earlier one. This is true even where the statutory lien is one that arises for work done on, and to the betterment of, the property in question. . . . The act creating the lien should be specific in declaring the fact, as well as the nature and extent, of the lien, and not leave the superseding or subordinating of an earlier lien to inference. . . . Particularly should this be true where, as in this case, the lien is not awarded for any service that adds value, or that preserves the property on which the earlier lien rests, and where it may be held that there was a benefit accruing."

There seems to be ground for a distinction as is pointed out in the quotation in the last case and in ECCLES v. WILL, respecting the power of the legislature and the interpretation of statutes, where the lien created by the statute is in the nature of an assessment for benefits (see notes in 35 L.R.A. 372, and 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 761, on the question of superiority of lien of local assessment over prior lien), and where no special benefit is conferred on the property by the work or material forming the basis of the lien. And it seems clear that, at least, in the absence of an express declaration of the legislative will to that effect, such a statute as that in the ECCLES CASE, enacted in the exercise of the police power, should not be construed as having priority over an existing mortgage.

Cases such as Yeatman v. King (1892) 2 N. D. 421, 33 Am. St. Rep. 797, 51 N. W. 721, in which it was held that a statute, in so far as it attempted to make a lien for seed grain furnished thereunder superior to the lien of a mortgage executed prior to the enactment of the statute, violated the provision of the Federal Constitution forbidding the impairment of the obligation of a contract, are of value on the present question.

And perusal of the cases in the note to Reeves & Co. v. Russell, L.R.A.1915D, 1149, on the general question of priority of lien for services on personal property over prior chattel mortgage will be found helpful.

As bearing on the question under discussion, attention is called also to the case of Howard v. Burke (1916) 176 Iowa, 123, L.R.A.1916E, 524, 157 N. W. 744, on the question whether the lien of a chattel mortgage on animals may constitutionally be subordinated to the claim of one who takes them damage feasant, and whether the statute subordinated the mortgage lien although it did not create a lien or expressly provide for priority. The question of priority as between the lien of a chattel mortgage and the claim of one taking animals damage feasant is treated in a note to this case in L.R.A. 1916E, on p. 528.

In Eccles v. Ditto (1917) — N. M. —, L.R.A.1918B, 126, 167 Pac. 726, which is cited in ECCLES v. WILL, ante, 1022, the court sustained the constitutionality of the statute creating the lien for work on artesian wells. And the question of the constitutionality of statutes to prevent waste of subterranean waters, natural gas, or oil is treated in notes in L.R.A. 1918B, 126, and 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 436.

Powers, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In the spring of 1914, the plaintiffs, through their traveling salesman, Pierce, sold the defendant a bill of goods which included the post card sets here in controversy. At the time of the sale, Pierce told the defendant that if he would buy the sets at the price named, he (Pierce) would not sell like sets to anyone else in the town. Upon this assurance, the defendant made the purchase. The plaintiffs did not keep this agreement, but at some time during the following winter they sold similar sets to one of the defendant's competitors doing business on the same street. The defendant learned of this about the 1st of June, 1915, but said or did nothing about it until some two years later and just before the trial below. The suit is brought to recover the balance due on the goods sold, and is defended on the ground that the plaintiffs, having broken the contract in the particular named, are not entitled to recover anything under it.

The trial below was by the court, and it is recited in the findings that there was no evidence from which a determination could be made as to the amount of damage the defendant had suffered by reason of the above-mentioned breach of the contract by the plaintiffs. Therefore the court assessed such damage at $1, deducted it from the amount due the plaintiffs, and rendered judgment for the latter for the balance, with interest thereon. To this the defendant excepted. So the only question before us is, Were the plaintiffs entitled to recover anything on the facts found?

The defense is predicated upon the doctrine, frequently approved by this court, that a breach that goes to the essence of the contract operates as a discharge of it. This rule will not avail the defendant. It is not every breach that goes to the essence. It gives rise to an action for damages, but it does not necessarily justify a refusal to perform. Where, as here, the stipulation goes only to a part of the consideration, and may be compensated for in damages, its breach does not relieve the other party from performance. In such cases, the broken promise is an independent undertaking, and not a condition precedent. Kauffman v. Raeder, 54 L.R.A. 247, 47 C. A. 278, 108 Fed. 171; Lowber v. Bangs, 2 Wall. 728, 17 L. ed. 768. See Rioux v. Ryegate Brick Co. 72 Vt. at p. 155, 47 Atl. 406. In order to operate as a discharge or give rise to a right of rescission, the partial failure to perform must go to the very root of the contract. Chamberlin v. Booth, 135 Ga. 719, 35 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1223, 70 S. E. 569. Keenan v. Brown, 21 Vt. 86, is a case of partial failure of performance, and it was held that the defendant therein was not absolved thereby, and was only entitled to recover his damages.

Moreover, when a contract has been partly performed by one party, and the other has derived a substantial benefit therefrom, the latter cannot refuse to comply with its terms simply because the former fails of complete performance. Kauffman v. Raeder, supra; 13 C. J. 659. "Where a person has received a part of the consideration for which he entered into the agreement," says Mr. Serjt. Williams, "it would be unjust that, because he has not had the whole, he should therefore be permitted to enjoy that part without either paying or doing anything for it." Pordage v. Cole, 1 Wms. Saund. 320d, 85 Eng. Reprint, 453. Hammond v. Buckmaster, 22 Vt. 375, is a case of this class, and it was therein held that, inasmuch as each party had received a partial benefit from the contract, and could not be placed in statu quo, the defendant would have to perform the contract, seeking his damages for the plaintiff's breach by cross action. These holdings are decisive of the case in hand. The stipulation in question was only a part of the consideration of the defendant's undertaking; was subordinate and incidental to its main purpose; its breach is compensable in damages; and the defendant obtained and now holds a substantial benefit under the contract. Other questions argued need not be considered.

The judgment below is without error, and is affirmed.

Annotation—Breach of agreement in contract of sale to give the purchaser the exclusive right of sale, as affecting the remedies of the parties.

A stipulation in a contract for the sale of an article, giving the buyer the exclusive right to sell such article within a designated territory, is not ordinarily of the essence of the contract, so as to preclude the seller from recovering the purchase price on the ground of the breach of the stipulation. TICHNOR BROS. v. EVANS, ante, 1025.

And it has been held that a stipulation in a contract for the sale of seeds, giving the purchaser the exclusive sale of seeds in a certain territory, is not a dependent covenant or a condition precedent which the seller is bound to prove he has performed in order to recover the purchase price, since it does not go to or constitute the entire consideration moving the buyer to purchase. Whatever loss the latter sustains by the breach of the agreement constitutes an injury for which he may seek compensation by a separate action, or by a counterclaim in an action for the purchase price. But the bare fact of the breach of the agreement will not excuse him from paying the purchase price. Springfield Seed Co. v. Walt (1902) 94 Mo. App. 76, 67 S. W. 938; and see, to the same effect, Turner v. Mellier (1875) 59 Mo. 529.

Where the stipulated time for payment expired before that within which the seller was required by the terms of the contract to observe a stipulation not to sell to any person in a certain place, the latter condition or provision cannot be treated as a condition precedent to a right of action to recover the purchase price; but the agreement being executory and entire, and the seller's breach being a substantial one, the buyer may rescind the contract on account thereof if the parties can be put in statu quo. Koerner v. Henn (1896) 8 App. Div. 602, 40 N. Y. Supp. 1021.

And in general it may be said that the breach of a contract for the sale of an article, giving a purchaser the exclusive right to sell in a certain territory, is substantial, and entitles the purchaser to rescind the contract. Freet v. American Electrical Supply Co. (1913) 257 Ill. 248, 100 N. E. 933.

And see Bride v. Riffe (1913) 93 Neb. 355, 140 N. W. 639, holding that the purchaser of merchandise for resale under a contract giving him the exclusive sale thereof in a certain territory, may, upon the breach of this provision, rescind the contract, return the merchandise, and thereby avoid liability for the purchase price. APPEAL by claimant from an order of the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Wisconsin (Geiger, District Judge) disallowing his claim for damages sustained by reason of his alleged unlawful dismissal from employment. Affirmed.

Statement by Alschuler, Circuit Judge:

Appellant Farmer, a mechanical engineer, was employed as superintendent of the bankrupt's gas engine shops at Milwaukee. After serving about two months in such capacity, a contract for a year's service, beginning August 1, 1912, was entered into, under which Farmer was to superintend and manage the shops, devoting his entire time thereto, and to receive for such service a salary of $6,500 and a bonus of $3 per engine if, with the equipment of the factory and such further equipment as had theretofore been specified by Farmer, 3,000 engines were produced within the year at prescribed factory costs, to fill contracts therefor which were extant. Provision was made for renewal of the contract for another year if Farmer "has made good his guaranty to make the said 3,000 engines now sold within this contract year, and within the above schedule cost of manufacture."

Under date of July 26th, the bankrupt had entered into a contract with the Imperial Automobile Company of Jackson, Michigan, to supply it 2,200 motors, with option for 1,000 more, during the entire year; the contracted deliveries for 1912 being August 100, September 130, October 260, November 260, and December 300.

The work of installing the new equipment was being carried on, and the manufacture of the engines proceeded, but in the months indicated only 190 engines were completed for delivery, and some, if not all of these, proved unsatisfactory. Demands for overdue deliveries were being made, as well as complaints respecting engines delivered. In response to the complaints the bankrupt's vice president, on December 18th, went to Jackson, taking Farmer with him. The next day Farmer started back home by way of Chicago. The vice president urged him to be back to the shops as soon as possible, and Farmer said he would reach Milwaukee the same day, as he intended stopping in Chicago but a short time to buy his wife a Christmas present. Upon reaching Chicago he did not return to Milwaukee, but remained at Chicago until L.R.A.1918C.

the 22d, indulging himself in diversion strictly personal. Coming to Milwaukee on the 22d, he did not go to the shop because of a severe cold he had contracted. On the 24th he was dismissed from his employment. Within six months thereafter the company became bankrupt. Farmer filed his claim for $13,062.45 for damage accruing to him by reason of his alleged unlawful dismissal.

The referee found that the absence from duty was in no manner on account of his own necessities or of the employer's business, but because of Farmer's own self-indulgence during that time. He found further that this absence and the failure to return to his employment were not such a breach of his contract of employment as to justify his dismissal, and that his conduct during such time was not such as was inconsistent with the nature of his employment, or rendered him unfit to continue it. He allowed the claim to the extent of $3,862.50 for the balance of the full year's salary, and disallowed it for the rest of the claim, which was based upon the bonus. Both parties petitioned for review, and the district court reversed the referee's order of allowance, and directed that the entire claim be disallowed. Farmer appeals.

Argued before Baker, Alschuler, and Evans, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Lyman G. Wheeler for appellant.

Mr. Arthur W. Fairchild, for appellee:

Where the question at issue is whether good ground for discharge exists, the motive for such discharge is entirely immaterial.

An employer has the right to give all lawful and reasonable commands deemed by him necessary for the proper management of his business, and the employee's duty is to obey such commands where there is nothing in the contract of employment to relieve him from such duty; and inexcusable substantial insubordination on the part of the employee, or wilful refusal to obey such commands, amounting to insubordination, is good ground for discharge.

W. 294.

Alschuler, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

It is maintained for appellant that one serving in a supervisory capacity is not so strictly accountable to the employer for his time as is a clerk or workman, and that Farmer's absence of two or three days without permission was not such a breach of the contract as warranted its termination. The legal proposition, as generally stated, is sustained by the authorities cited from Wisconsin, the state where this contract was made, as well as elsewhere. Moody v. Streissguth Clothing Co. 96 Wis. 202, 71 N. W. 99; Schumaker v. Heinemann, 99 Wis. 251, 74 N. W. 785; Loos v. George Walter Brewing Co. 145 Wis. 1, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1052, 129 N. W. 645; Green v. Somers, 163 Wis. 96, 157 N. W. 529; Beach, Contr. § 584.

But the applicability of such rule must depend on the facts of particular cases. Conditions may be readily imagined where in a well-organized, smoothly running, and successful business a day's or even a month's absence of a general superintendent, who has the business well in hand, might be wholly consistent with its continued uneventful and successful operation. Upon the other hand, the business may be in condition so critical that a single hour's wilful absence of such an officer at such a time might well be regarded as rank disloyalty and gross insubordination. Nearly five months of the new contract period had passed. Instead of deliveries of 1,050 engines required during that time under a single contract, to say nothing of other outstanding contracts, but 190 all told had in fact been delivered, and these more or less defective. Purchasers were clamoring for deliveries and complaining of defects in those delivered; materials were delayed; there was more or less trouble in the shop; and things generally seemed to be going awry. Added to this, the new equipment was in process of installation; old machines were being moved and changed; and the shop was undergoing radical rearrangement and reconstruction. The responsible head was Farmer. He had various foremen under him, but he was the only mechanical engineer connected with the plant, and while in authority it was upon his designing, planning, and direction that success or failure depended. This high-priced man faced obstacles, to surmount which would manifestly require his fullest capacity and undivided attention. Surely this was not a situation wherein the man at the helm might needlessly and with impunity abandon his post that he may tread "the primrose path of dalliance."

It is urged that the evidence shows no harm to the business resulting from these days of absence of its mechanical head. The sentry sleeping at his post is not less derelict in duty if, haply, disaster does not follow; nor is the responsible employee's disloyalty or insubordination measured by the extent of the resultant harm to the employer, nor minimized if none happens to follow.

It is insisted that even if, while at Chicago, appellant did transgress the canons of propriety and right living, this of itself would not warrant his dismissal. The authorities support the proposition that if the transgression does not injure the employer, nor unfit the transgressor for the employment, termination of a contract of employment for such cause alone would not be justified. Wood, Mast. & S. § 110; Child v. Boyd & C. Boot & Shoe Mfg. Co. 175 Mass. 493, 56 N. E. 608; Brownell v. Ehrich, 43 App. Div. 369, 60 N. Y. Supp. 112. But the dismissal here is not justified on the ground of the employee's personal transgression at Chicago. The fact of the transgression affords evidence that the absence from duty was not necessitated by any of such causes as might excuse it, and emphasizes the conclusion that it was wilful and deliberate, and under conditions which gave to the conduct strong color of disloyalty and insubordination.

Nor is it material that at the time of the dismissal the employer did not know of his conduct at Chicago, and did not assign it as a cause of dismissal. Even if the cause assigned for dismissal was not in itself sufficient, if it appears that sufficient cause therefor did in fact exist, the dismissal was justified. Wood, Mast. & S. § 121; Labatt, Mast. & S. § 189; Carpenter Steel Co. v. Norcross, 123 C. C. A. 63, 204 Fed. 537, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1035; Thomas v. Beaver Dam Mfg. Co. 157 Wis. 427, 147 N. W. 364, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1020; Loos v. George Walter Brewing Co. 145 Wis. 1, 140 Am. St. Rep. 1052, 129 N. W. 645; Von Heyne v. Tompkins, 89 Minn. 77, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 524, 93 N. W. 901. But the employer did then know the desperate condition of things at home; did know that appellant's place was there, and his presence there much needed; did know appellant had been asked at Jackson to return at once to the shop, and had stated he would do so after a short stay at Chicago for buying a present; and did know that for several days he did not put in appearance at his place of duty. Without any excuse appearing for the absence, such as illness or other unavoidable cause might afford, the employer was warranted in attributing it to a wilful disregard of the master's interest, and to insubordination, which, in our judgment, upon this record, justified his dismissal.

The order of the District Court is therefore affirmed.

Annotation—Grounds or justification for discharge of one employed in executive or supervisory capacity.

Introduction.

Other questions arising out of the discharge of a servant are treated in notes cited in the L.R.A. Indexes under the title, "Master and Servant," subtitle, "Termination of relation; discharge; enticing."

In the present note it is aimed to cover the cases involving the discharge of persons holding executive or supervisory positions with special references to the effect of the grade of employment upon the sufficiency of the grounds for discharge, the cases being set out when, from the discussion of the court or the circumstances of the case, it appears that the grade of employment was important. In a number of cases involving the lawfulness of the discharge of persons in executive or supervisory employment, there is nothing in the circumstances or in the statements of the court giving any special significance to the fact that the person held a supervisory or executive position, but such cases have been included in brief form under the various headings for the sake of completeness. L.R.A. 1918C.

Neglect of duties.

The courts recognize, as was done in RE MILWAUKEE MOTOR Co. ante, 1027, that one holding a supervisory position has more latitude in the performance of his duties than does a mere clerk or workman; but, of course, the extent of his discretion in such matters depends upon the particular circumstances.

Thus, in Moody v. Streissguth Clothing Co. (1897) 96 Wis. 202, 71 N. W. 99, it was held that one who agreed to assume charge of and manage his employer's business and store in a certain city, and had some discretion in the matter of the discharge of his duties and the employment of his time, might properly be absent from the store at times when, according to his judgment, the interests of his employment demanded him to be, and such absences would not be ground for his discharge. The court said: "Of course, the general manager of a business must have a discretion as to the manner of its conduct and the most advantageous use of his own time. . . . If they [absences] were actually occasioned by and employed in good faith in what the plaintiff deemed to be the furtherance of the interests of the defendant's business, they could afford no ground for plaintiff's discharge."

And in the above case, where one of the grounds given for plaintiff's discharge was that on one occasion he failed to lock the store at night, which he explained by saying that he left another to lock the store, the court said: "It would seem that the general manager of a business would have power to delegate to some other servant the performance of so simple an office."

A contract by which plaintiff agreed to act as foreman and landscape gardener, and take charge of the property of defendant and give his whole time and attention to the work, with a stipulation that he would keep in perfect repair the premises and the roads and highways on the premises, was a contract for personal services, and not a general contract to perform certain work according to specifications or designs, and the allegation of performance on the part of plaintiff related to his having devoted his skill and attention to the work, and he was entitled to show that, where the results hoped for and promised were not attained, the failure might be explained by showing that he was prevented from fulfilling his agreement by defendant's acts in requiring the performance of work and labor outside his employment, which so occupied his time that he was not able fully to keep the premises and roads in perfect repair, and that to keep the premises in perfect repair required work and labor in addition to that possible by plaintiff's personal efforts. Sexton v. Richardson (1907) 6 Cal. App. 459, 92 Pac. 395.

Absence of the manager of a hotel for considerable portions of the day, but explained by him on the ground that most of this time was used in the necessary conduct of the hotel business, such as collecting and soliciting trade, did not show sufficient neglect of duty to warrant his discharge. Wyatt v. Brown (1897) — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 478.

But where such manager having sole charge of the hotel, the owners being absent most of the time, had agreed to give his undivided attention to the business, though not precluded by such agreement from taking reasonable time for recreation, he was not justified in taking the hours from 8 to 12 every evening, at which time the majority of the transient guests arrived at the hotel, and during which time the hotel was left in charge of the elevator boy, who was not competent to take care of the business properly; and such neglect of duty was sufficient ground for the manager's discharge. Ibid.

And neglect of duty by persons holding executive positions has been held to be sufficient ground for discharge without special reference to the character of plaintiff's employment, in Hendrickson v. Anderson (1858) 50 N. C. (5 Jones, L.) 246 (overseer and manager of slaves; absence from farm, disorderly conduct in a sleeping apartment, intoxication, and neglect of duty); Glasgow v. Hood (1900) — Tenn. —, 57 S. W. 162 (business manager of college under contract for fifteen years for one third of the profits; failure through incompetence or otherwise to perform his duties properly; detailed facts not being given); Wright v. Lake (1908) 48 Wash. 469, 93 Pac. 1072, (manager of dairy business; negligence in permitting team to run away twice, endangering employer's property and other persons); Nash v. Kreling (1899) 6 Cal. Unrep. 233, 56 Pac. 260 (whether plaintiff neglected duties as stage manager left to jury; verdict for defendant; facts of neglect not being given); Johnson v. Walker (1892) 155 Mass. 253, 31 Am. St. Rep. 550, 29 N. E. 522 (foreman in shoe factory absent seven weeks though because of illness); Smith v. Allen (1862) 3 Fost. & F. (Eng.) 157 (superintendent of chemical factory; left to jury whether his hours at factory showed neglect of duty).

Incompetence.

Where one employed as manager of a turpentine plant was ordered by his employer to do work which properly was the work of a mechanic, and not contemplated by the contract to be that of the manager, his unskilful manner of doing it will not afford grounds for discharging him, in the absence of proof that he was guilty of gross negligence. Pringle v. Producers' Turpentine Co. (1910) 126 La. 1095, 53 So. 359.

The fact that one employed as superintendent of a mill is not an expert in all the operations under his charge is not necessarily a sufficient ground for his discharge; but, to constitute such ground, it must appear that it was necessary, to enable the superintendent to successfully operate the mill, that he understand such operations in order to intelligently direct those under him in those departments. Eubanks v. Als-paugh (1905) 139 N. C. 520, 52 S. E. 207.

In Carroll v. Cohen (1914) 5 Boyce (Del.) 233, 91 Atl. 1001, a suit for the recovery of salary due on a written contract for the employment of plaintiff as manager of the retail department of defendant's business, in which plaintiff agreed to devote his entire time, attention, and energy to the performance of his duties as such manager, and in which defendant was given the right to terminate the agreement if plaintiff should manage the business under his supervision badly or in any improper way, or should misconduct himself,—the court said that, although plaintiff neither insured nor guaranteed the results of his work as manager of the business, he must show substantial compliance with all the provisions of the contract, and although an occasional mistake which might have been made by any competent manager of such business would not be inconsistent with a substantial compliance, yet, on the other hand, mistakes of a nature that would substantially affect the business would be evidence justifying his dismissal.

Insubordination.

As to discharge of employees generally for disobedience of regulations, see Thomas v. Houston, S. & G. Co. 37 L.R.A.(N.S.) 950, and note.

And as to the duty of servants generally to obey the master's orders, see Development Co. v. King, 24 L.R.A.(N.S.) 812, and the note thereto.

It is recognized that one holding a position of responsibility requiring the exercise of executive powers is not bound to as strict adherence to directions of superiors as one in an employment involving the exercise of less responsibility and discretion.

So, in Cook v. Stabb (1888) New Foundl. Rep. 240, the refusal by the superintendent of a lobster factory, who had control of preparing and canning the lobsters and the people engaged thereat as well as of the lobster fishermen, to cease taking count of lobsters upon their arrival, which defendant ordered left to another, and to confine himself to the factory, was held to be justified, and not ground for peremptory discharge, inasmuch as he was not an ordinary servant, but was invested with such supervisory powers and had such peculiar fitness and stood so high in the business that his name was used on the labels as a guaranty of superiority, he testifying that it was necessary for him to keep tally of the lobsters to properly manage the business, and that his reputation was dependent on his success, and he regarded an interference with him in these matters as a breach of defendant's agreement with him.

In Park Bros. & Co. v. Bushnell (1894) 9 C. C. A. 138, 20 U. S. App. 425, 60 Fed. 583, an action involving the discharge of one employed by a large manufacturer of steel as superintendent of agencies for the sale of steel, because of alleged disobedience to general orders regarding his conduct of the business, the court said that it was manifest that the relations of plaintiff to defendant were not those of a menial or domestic servant, but that he had been the superintendent of a large and important business for a long time, was constantly obliged to be the representative of defendant in different states, and to attend with promptness, resoluteness, and good judgment to its large pecuniary interests; and apparently approved of a charge of the trial judge to the effect that what would justify the rescission of a contract for employment in the case of a mere workman or clerk might not justify it in the case of a person whose duties were of such a character as those which were intrusted to plaintiff.

In Carpenter Steel Co. v. Norcross (1913) 123 C. C. A. 63, 204 Fed. 537, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 1035, involving the discharge of one employed as manager of a warehouse and as salesman, on the ground, so far as it affected his duty as manager, that he had been guilty of insubordination in failing to obey directions contained in a letter of embezzlement in appropriating portions of a fund furnished for expenses to his own use, and of untruthfulness in stating that he had certain balances on hand which he did not in fact have, the court, in determining that under the evidence these matters were questions for the jury, took into consideration the fact that plaintiff's position was one of high grade, that much was left to his discretion and judgment, and that he was but slightly hampered by directions, citing Park Bros. & Co. v. Bushnell (Fed.) supra.

In Schaub v. Arc Welding Co. (1900) 123 Mich. 487, 82 N. W. 235, an action by one who had been employed as general superintendent of defendant's plant, who was discharged for insubordination toward the president of the corporation, the court said: "It is true the language of plaintiff might be deemed disrespectful, but we are not prepared to say that the language of Mr. Coffin [the president] was altogether respectful, when it is considered that the plaintiff occupied a position of great responsibility."

While presumably it is the duty of an ordinary factory superintendent upon reasonable notice to attend a meeting of the board of directors at which his presence is necessary for the proper conduct of the business, whether the refusal to obey such an order will amount to such insubordination as would justify his discharge may depend upon the reasonableness and importance of the order when given, the degree of discretion intrusted to him or required by the nature of his work, the urgent necessity for giving his personal attention to some other part of his work at the time, or other circumstances of the particular case. So, where the meeting was called at another city and there was no evidence of any rule or custom requiring him to attend meetings at such place, and the meeting was not held in the office of defendant, but in the law office of its counsel, and was apparently not called for an ordinary business conference between directors and superintendents, but to subject the superintendent to an examination by the defendant's attorney, it was not error to refuse to charge that such refusal was a sufficient ground for his discharge. Crabtree v. Bay State Felt Co. (1917) 227 Mass. 68, 116 N. E. 535.

In Shaver v. Ingham (1886) 58 Mich. 649, 55 Am. Rep. 712, 26 N. W. 162, the court held that it was a question for the jury whether the insubordination of plaintiff, a foreman, in taking part of a day to attend to his own business against the orders of his employer, where apparently no actual harm resulted to the employer from such absence, was so unreasonable as to be grounds for a dismissal, the court apparently recognizing a distinction between menial domestic servants and skilled mechanics or other employees as to what insubordination would be grounds for dismissal, but making no special distinction as to employees holding supervisory positions.

In Lehigh Valley R. Co. v. Snyder (1893) 56 N. J. L. 326, 28 Atl. 376, it was held that the fact that a captain of a boat refused to obey an order of his superior which the superior had no legal power to give was not ground for his dismissal.

The exercise, with greater freedom than contemplated by the employer, of a discretion given to the manager of a store as to the extension of credit, is not disobedience. Watson v. Ross (1874) 5 L.R.A. 1918C.

Austr. Jur. (Vict.) 60, Labatt, Mast. & S. p. 837.

One employed in a supervisory capacity may be justified in refusing to do the work of an ordinary employee.

So, in Wright v. C. S. Graves Land Co. (1898) 100 Wis. 269, 75 N. W. 1000, where plaintiff was employed by a concern engaged in developing a tract of land and establishing a village, "to perform such labor as may be necessary in the superintending the clearing of land, building of roads, constructing of buildings, or any other labor that may be required of him by the party of the first part," it was held that the term in the contract, "or any other labor that may be required of him," meant also to superintend any other labor the defendant might have done there, especially in view of the fact that the parties had given the contract a practical construction by their acts, and that no claim seems to have been made that plaintiff should do any work other than superintending until it became evident that the scheme to build the city was not developing as expected; and refusal of plaintiff to use his team and himself engage in common labor was not sufficient ground for his discharge.

And a woman employed "to take charge of the dressmaking department as manager and dressmaker," with power to employ and discharge the employees, and to have entire management and control of the department, was not employed as a dressmaker, and had a right to refuse to do the work of a seamstress, and such refusal was not a sufficient ground for her discharge. Marx v. Miller (1901) 134 Ala. 347, 32 So. 765.

Where a superintendent of a salt plant was told by those in charge that he would, if necessary, be required to perform work and services of a nature subordinate to that of superintendent, and that, if necessary, he would be required to paint the smokestack and pull ashes out of the boiler, the court was authorized to submit to the jury the charge that, if they believed defendant required plaintiff to do other work than that embraced within the scope of his employment, they might find for plaintiff. Lone Star Salt Co. v. Wilderspin (1904) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 81 S. W. 327.

One employed as general manager of all his employer's stores in a certain city was justified in refusing to be transferred to a minor store where his duties would be those of a salesman and porter, and was entitled to recover for his discharge because of such refusal. Wolf

Cigar Stores Co. v. Kramer (1908) 50 Tex. Civ. App. 411, 109 S. W. 990.

In Stuart v. Richardson (1806) Hume, 390, 3 Scots' Dig. 1800-1873, col. 243, it was held that a person hired to manage a farm was not bound to officiate as a servant of all work.

And in Fairie v. M'Vicar (1771) 2 Hutch. (Scot.) 168, note, Labatt, Mast. & S. p. 884, it was held that an overseer of a coal works could not be forced to assist at the windlass wheel and click the coals at the pit.

And an overseer who was subordinate to the general manager of a farm was held entitled to refuse to do manual work. Cobban v. Lawson (1868) 6 Scot. L. R. 60, 3 Scots' Dig. 1800-1873, col. 225.

But the fact that an employee holds a position of authority over others, involving the exercise of executive and supervisory powers, does not relieve him from all duty of obedience to the orders of his superiors.

So, in Jerome v. Queen City Cycle Co. (1900) 163 N. Y. 351, 57 N. E. 485, where it appeared that plaintiff, who was superintendent of a factory under a contract in which he agreed to give his services to the employer and devote his best efforts to the faithful and efficient discharge of the duties of superintendent, had been absent from duty on several occasions, and had been warned by his employer not to again absent himself without first receiving permission from the president, but, notwithstanding this, absented himself for one day to attend to business of his own after informing his employer that he was going to be absent and being refused permission to be absent on that day, the court held that such absence was sufficient ground for his discharge. "The plaintiff was in law a servant, although of a high grade, with full control and discretion as to hiring and dismissing all the other servants. In other respects he was subject to the reasonable orders of his master, for there was nothing in the contract to relieve him from the duty of obedience required by law. He had charge of an extensive manufactory where 600 men were at work. The defendant had the right to manage its own business and to decide whether the services of the plaintiff were necessary at the factory on the day in question. It did so decide, and he had no power to overrule the decision, for that would make the master and servant change places. He did not ask leave to go some other day, and was not told that he could not go some other day when the situation of the business in the master's judgment would permit it. It was unreasonable for the plaintiff, when employed to superintend extensive operations and many men, to take a day off at will for a private purpose regardless of the condition of the business or the wishes of his employer." The court said further that whether his absence resulted in actual injury to the business of defendant was not the question, for it had a tendency to have, and would naturally have, that effect in a large factory where something was liable to occur at any moment which would require the presence of the superintendent.

Abusive language and threats of personal violence to the son and acting agent of the employer are sufficient ground for the discharge of an overseer. Youngblood v. Dodd (1847) 2 La. Ann. 187.

In Degen v. Manistee, F. C. & E. L. R. Co. (1897) 113 Mich. 66, 71 N. W. 459, it was held that the refusal of a superintendent of a street railway to carry out the orders of the president as to reinstating a man whom the superintendent had taken off a run was sufficient ground for his discharge, the president having direct charge of all the affairs of the street railway company, and plaintiff being under contract "to perform such duties as may be required of him."

Where the captain of a boat declined further to serve in such capacity because of the employment of a new engineer for the boat against his objection that such engineer was incompetent and that, as master of the steamer, plaintiff would regard himself and the vessel as being unsafe if such person acted as engineer, on account of threats made by him against the life and person of the plaintiff, plaintiff was properly discharged, in the absence of any arrangement giving him the right to select his engineer or any other member of the crew. Green v. Watson (1891) 60 Hun, 582, 14 N. Y. Supp. 820.

In Townsley v. Bankers' L. Ins. Co. (1900) 56 App. Div. 232, 67 N. Y. Supp. 664, it was held that one employed as general manager, having entire control of the agency force of an incorporated assessment insurance company, the stockholders of which consisted of the policy holders, was guilty of a distinct violation of his duty when he, acting as an employee or officer of the company, obtained from the policy holders proxies to vote at a meeting of the members of the corporation, under an implied representation that such proxies were to be used to continue the present officers, when in fact he intended to use and did use them for the purpose of ousting the officers of the company and selecting others in their place, and that such conduct was a sufficient ground for his discharge.

An attempt by an overseer of slaves to control them contrary to the positive commands of the owner is sufficient ground for his discharge. Lane v. Phillips (1859) 51 N. C. (6 Jones, L.) 455.

One employed as manager of a publishing department "with reasonable and proper authority to conduct it," who was to receive as compensation a proportion of the profits of the business and at the expiration of the contract one third of the value of the stock, copyright, and trade, to be paid in a sum of money equal to such value, was, in exercising authority in his department, subordinate to his employer, the corporation defendant, and was subject to discharge for insubordination in refusing to move his office from one floor to another of the building. Peniston v. John Y. Huber Co. (1900) 196 Pa. 580, 46 Atl. 934.

In Green v. Somers (1916) 163 Wis. 96, 157 N. W. 529, it was held that refusal by one who was employed as general manager of a hotel with no definition of his duties except as embraced in the term "general manager," to comply with orders of his superior to appoint an assistant manager, to have the storekeeper make all the purchases, to close the hotel laundry, and to discharge help employed for the personal benefit of the manager and his family, was sufficient insubordination to warrant his discharge.

That a superintendent of a railroad sent someone else to investigate an accident resulting in death, which occurred on the road, instead of investigating it personally as directed, though perhaps no disrespect was intended, together with errors in his accounts, was sufficient ground for his discharge. Webster v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1857) 1 Lower Can. Jur. 223.

In Dick v. Canada Jute Co. (1886) 30 Lower Can. Jur. 185, it was held that an insolent manner toward the director and president of a factory, and disobedience of and noncompliance with orders, were grounds for the discharge of the manager of the plant.

The fact that an overseer of slaves used abusive language toward his employer and threatened him with violence L.R.A.1918C.

because the employer changed the employment of slaves without consulting the overseer was sufficient ground for his discharge. Boone v. Lyde (1848) 3 Strobb. L. (S. C.) 77.

A claim by one employed as clerk and manager to superintend and conduct a business, he being paid a salary and sometimes a share of the profits, that he was a partner in the business, was sufficient ground for his discharge. Amor v. Fearon (1839) 1 Peary & D. 398, 9 Ad. & El. 548, 112 Eng. Reprint, 1320, 2 W. W. & H. 81, 8 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 95.

In Cussons v. Skinner (1843) 11 Mees. & W. 161, 152 Eng. Reprint, 758, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 347, an action for the wrongful discharge of plaintiff as manager of defendant's manufactory, it was held, under a plea that plaintiff so wrongfully, disobediently, and unskillfully conducted himself that defendant suffered loss, that, in order to support such plea, it was necessary to show not only disobedience, but such disobedience as occasioned a loss.

And disobedience of orders was held to be sufficient grounds for discharge, without any apparent importance attaching to the fact that the party held a supervisory position, in Kenner v. Southwestern Oil Co. (1904) 113 La. 80, 36 So. 895 (local manager of oil sales; refusal to make reports as ordered); Kessee v. Mayfield (1859) 14 La. Ann. 90 (overseer of plantation; disobedience of instructions); Von Heyne v. Tompkins (1903) 89 Minn. 77, 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 524, 93 N. W. 901 (manager of farm; disobedience of orders regarding sale of stock); Smith v. Herring-Hall-Marvin Safe Co. (1909) 115 N. Y. Supp. 204 (sales manager under general contract of employment without specifications as to duties or place; refusal to go to another city to work); Voelckel v. Banner Brewing Co. (1895) 9 Ohio C. C. 318, 6 Ohio C. D. 80, 2 Ohio Dec. 168 (general manager and superintendent of business; failure to turn over money collected as directed, but instead applying part of it to his salary); Gallagher v. Wayne Steam Co. (1898) 188 Pa. 95, 41 Atl. 296 (manager of plant; obstinate refusal to comply with orders of employer as to method of installing appliances for customers).

Conduct toward or relations with subordinates.

The infliction of cruel and unusual punishment upon a male slave of a plantation, and immoral conduct with the female slaves, were held, in Dwyer v.

Cane (1851) 6 La. Ann. 707, to be sufficient ground for the discharge of an overseer, although he was not guilty of such mismanagement of the plantation as would have authorized his dismissal.

Rules for the government of a plantation under which the manager was enjoined not to abuse or whip tenants, and under which he was not permitted to carry a pistol, it being the owner's purpose to avoid all manner of disturbances and encounters between the manager and tenants, and to secure quiet and orderly conduct of his property, were reasonable and commendable, and a manager who refused to comply with such rules was properly discharged. Corley v. Rivers (1914) 107 Miss. 67, 64 So. 964.

Where an overseer of slaves knocked a slave down with a handspike because of disobedience, and continued to beat him until the blows resulted in his death, the employer not only had a right to discharge him, but it was his duty to do so. Posey v. Garth (1821) 7 Mo. 94, 37 Am. Dec. 183.

In Boone v. Lyde (1848) 3 Strobb. L. (S. C.) 77, it was held that the fact that an overseer of slaves, employed under a written contract stipulating that he was to govern the slaves with humanity and kindness, snapped a gun at a slave who ran away from a flogging, and would probably have killed the slave had not the gun failed to explode, was sufficient ground for his discharge.

Miskeeping the time of employees by an overseer of a plantation, causing constant dissatisfaction among such employees and danger of losing them, together with the fact that the overseer was sick for a considerable period of the time, was sufficient ground for terminating his employment. Miller v. Gidierre (1884) 36 La. Ann. 201.

In Lindner v. Cape Brewery & Ice Co. (1908) 131 Mo. App. 680, 111 S. W. 600, where it appeared that plaintiff was employed as brew master and superintendent of the bottling department of a brewery, and upon the manager reinstating an employee of the bottling department whom plaintiff had discharged for a trivial offense, plaintiff refused to continue his work in the bottling department unless such employee would agree to obey him, it was held that such refusal was sufficient ground for his discharge.

If an overseer, either negligently or for want of capacity, makes mistakes about his master's business detrimental to his master's interest, he may be discharged; but if he is competent to discharge the duties of his employment, and not negligent in the performance of his duty, it is no ground to discharge him merely that he is unable to control some of the laborers whom he is employed to superintend. Hattaway v. Sanderlin (1916) 145 Ga. 219, 88 S. E. 941.

One employed as superintendent of printing at a time when a strike was on in the printing establishment, who fulfilled his duties efficiently, was improperly discharged where the reason given by defendant's manager for plaintiff's discharge was that the men would not work with plaintiff. Sun Printing & Pub. Asso. v. Edwards (1905) 69 C. C. A. 365, 136 Fed. 591.

Receipt by a foreman of money from an employee under him, with knowledge that it was given for the purpose of securing a preference in giving out work, was sufficient reason for his discharge. Engel v. Schoolherr (1884) 12 Daly (N. Y.) 417.

Engaging in other business.

Generally, as to interest in or connection with other business as ground for discharge of an employee, see Myers v. Roger J. Sullivan Co. 34 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1217, and note.

As to right of principal or employer to earnings by agent or servant who undertakes extraneous work, see notes to Barber v. National Carbon Co. 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1154, and Ogallah Elevator Co. v. Harrison, L.R.A.1916D, 782.

One employed to superintend the lumber yard of his employer, with which was connected the business of purchasing and shipping wood, was properly discharged for engaging in the wood business so that he came in competition with his employer, both at the buying and selling points, even though he conducted such business entirely by agents and gave his whole time and attention to the business of his employer. Dieringer v. Meyer (1877) 42 Wis. 311, 24 Am. Rep. 415.

The fact that a foreman of a certain part of the work of a dairy entered into a partnership for the sale and distribution of milk, thus coming in competition with his employer not only generally, but in the same locality, seeking and inducing numerous customers of his employer to take milk from him instead of from the employer, was sufficient ground for his discharge, notwithstanding the fact that the part of the dairy business over which he was foreman had no direct connection with the selling and distribution of milk. Hibbard v. Wood (1912) 49 Pa. Super. Ct. 513.

In Atlantic Compress Co. v. Young (1903) 118 Ga. 868, 45 S. E. 677, a suit by one who was discharged from service in conducting the business of a cotton compress and warehouse, under which employment it was his duty to devote all his time to the service of defendant, he being discharged because, although defendant was engaged in the business of loading cotton on railroad cars, he engaged in loading cotton for another mill and used the appliances and employees of defendant for that purpose without its knowledge or consent and received the compensation therefor, the court said: "Such a privilege, under any circumstances, and especially when the employee is a superintendent, would tend to induce the employee to prefer his personal interest to that of his employer, and to make excuses for neglecting the business of his employer, and to avail himself of opportunities to pursue his own advantage. If the evidence had shown satisfactorily that the employee in this case was not, during regular working hours, constantly occupied with duties he owed to his employer, a due regard for the obligations imposed upon him by his contract of employment would have required him to obtain the consent of his employer before he should undertake, for his own benefit, duties outside of his regular business."

Where a territorial sales manager for a manufacturing corporation contracted to give his "whole time and attention and best endeavors to the business of the company," it was error, in an action for his discharge, for the court to instruct the jury that the manager might give some of his time to the business of another concern, provided such attention did not interfere with his duty to defendant. Hughes v. Toledo Scale & Cash Register Co. (1905) 112 Mo. App. 91, 86 S. W. 895.

But in Brownell v. Ehrich (1899) 43 App. Div. 369, 60 N. Y. Supp. 112, leave to appeal denied in (1899) 44 App. Div. 630, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1134, it was held that the fact that plaintiff, who was employed as buyer and manager of a department of defendant's store in New York, formed a corporation for the sale of bicycles in Brooklyn, was not sufficient ground for his discharge so long as it did not interfere with his employer's business and the contract of employment did not exclude him from engaging in other business.

Dissatisfaction.

Generally, as to discharge under a contract of employment which requires work to be satisfactory, see Beissel v. Vermillion Farmers' Elevator Co. 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 403; Mackenzie v. Minis, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1003; Schmand v. Jandorf, 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 680; and American Music Stores v. Kussel, L.R.A.1916F, 882, and the notes thereto.

In Snyder v. Greenhut (1911) 71 Misc. 117, 127 N. Y. Supp. 1068, an action for wrongful discharge of plaintiff from his position as manager of and buyer for the shoe department of defendant's business, under a contract by which he covenanted to "give satisfactory service" to defendant, the court held that it was erroneous to leave it to the jury, under instructions, to determine whether plaintiff's services were executed with such skill and care as a reasonable man might be satisfied with, or whether or not his services were of such a character that defendant was justified in discharging him, making a distinction between such a position as that held by plaintiff, which required considerable executive ability and sound judgment, and that of an ordinary employee in this respect, the position which plaintiff contracted to fill being one of trust and confidence, and not within the rule requiring that the employer's dissatisfaction be based on reasonable grounds.

And the legality of the discharge of persons employed in supervisory capacities was sustained on the ground of dissatisfaction on the part of the employer, apparently without any special significance attaching to the grade of the employment, in American Music Stores v. Kussel (1916) L.R.A.1916F, 882, 146 C. C. A. 354, 232 Fed. 306 (western manager of defendant's stores contracting to serve "to the satisfaction of" defendant; good faith in dissatisfaction being sufficient); Mackenzie v. Minis (1909) 132 Ga. 323, 23 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1003, 63 S. E. 900, 16 Ann. Cas. 723, (gardener and manager of farm; the contract providing for services "to the satisfaction of the employer, good faith in dissatisfaction only being required); Teichner v. Pope Mfg. Co. (1900) 125 Mich. 91, 83 N. E. 1033 (manager of local business employed with power in employer to terminate employment for conduct unsatisfactory to the employer or for other cause, the discharge being because defendant had an opportunity to place in charge a manager having had more experience, which it bona fide believed would be to its benefit); Schmand v. Jan- dorf (1913) 175 Mich. 88, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 680, 140 N. W. 996, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 746 (candy maker and manager of retail store with two or three assistants to "serve to the satisfaction" of the employer; Diggle v. Ogston Motor Co. [1915] W. N. (Eng.) 37, 12 L. T. N. S. 1029, 84 L. J. K. B. N. S. 2165 (superintendent of motor works to perform duties "to the satisfaction of the directors;" dissatisfaction being genuine though not well founded); Corgan v. George F. Lee Coal Co. (1907) 218 Pa. 386, 120 Am. St. Rep. 891, 67 Atl. 655, 11 Ann. Cas. 838 (mine foreman employed so long as he satisfactorily performed his duties as foreman; the dissatisfaction being genuine though, perhaps, not well founded).

But the employer may be liable if the alleged dissatisfaction is not bona fide. Farmer v. Golde Clothes Shop (1916) 225 Mass. 260, 114 N. E. 330 (manager of store); Diamond v. Mendelsohn (1913) 156 App. Div. 636, 141 N. Y. Supp. 775 (foreman of a factory engaged to serve "to best of his ability and complete satisfaction of his employer," where alleged dissatisfaction was an evident afterthought, cutting expense being given at the time of discharge as the reason therefor); Beissel v. Vermillion Farmers' Elevator Co. (1907) 102 Minn. 229, 12 L.R.A.(N.S.) 403, 113 N. W. 575 (manager of elevator).

So, under a contract providing for the employment of plaintiff as foreman of defendants' molding shop "for a term of three years, or as long as he performs his duty in a successful or satisfactory manner," defendants were liable for damages in discharging plaintiff during the three-year period, since his duties as foreman were performed in a good, efficient, and workmanlike manner. Bridgeford & Co. v. Meagher (1911) 144 Ky. 479, 139 S. W. 750.

And a mere recital in a contract of employment, that the employee (a manager of a sales department) was desirous of filling such position to the satisfaction of the parties of the first part, was a mere statement of an obvious state of mind of the employee at the time, and was not sufficient to authorize his discharge because of dissatisfaction, the employment being for a definite period. Heller v. Bodensiek (1913) 81 Misc. 222, 142 N. Y. Supp. 496.

Immoral or intemperate conduct.

The question of intoxication as ground for discharge of a servant or agent is L.R.A.1918C.

discussed generally in a note to Willis v. Lowery, 38 L.R.A.(N.S.) 339.

In Armour-Cudahy Packing Co. v. Hart (1893) 36 Neb. 166, 54 N. W. 262, where the manager of defendant's packing establishment was discharged for neglect of his duties, it appeared that plaintiff constantly used intoxicating liquors in considerable quantities and permitted the foreman immediately under him to use such liquors. The court said: "It is clearly shown that liquor for the use of the defendant in error and others was constantly kept at hand and was continually drank; thus the influence of the manager was given in favor of its use by subordinates and employees. The offense is much more serious when committed by one in authority than by a mere laborer, as the example and influence of the manager is thus placed in favor of its use. With the amount of liquor shown to have been consumed by the defendant in error and his subordinates, it is not a matter of surprise that duties were neglected and the plaintiff in error sustained loss."

In Physioc v. Shea (1885) 75 Ga. 466, it was held that the discharge of a foreman of a tailor shop was justified because he went on a spree for from one to several days, thus neglecting his business as foreman.

One engaged as a choir master of a church was properly dismissed for being drunk upon his first appearance for duty. Martin v. Lane (1885) 3 Manitoba L. R. 314.

One who contracted to superintend two farms was bound thereby for reasonable attention to his employer's farm hands and for ordinary skill in conducting the operations of the farms, both of which required his personal service on the farms and with the farm hands at the usual and accustomed times for work; and where it was shown that he was often seen at grogshops and at a bowling alley at the depot in the working hours of the day and on Sundays, and at one time was seen engaged in playing cards in the forenoon of a week day, and was frequently excited with spirits, but not drunk, it was not necessary, to justify his discharge, to show that any special injury resulted therefrom to his employer, as his conduct had a tendency to damage the employer, and the employer was not bound to wait until his crop was ruined before he removed the cause of the impending evil. Fly v. Armstrong (1858) 50 N. O. (5 Jones, L.) 339.

And the use of intoxicating liquors was held sufficient ground for discharge without special reference to the grade of the employment, in Marshall v. Central Ontario R. Co. (1897) 28 Ont. Rep. 241 (roadmaster using liquor while on duty, though it did not actually interfere with his work); Clouston & Co. v. Corry [1906] A. C. (Eng.) 122, 75 L. J. P. C. N. S. 20, 54 Week. Rep. 382, 93 L. T. N. S. 706, 22 Times L. R. 107 (manager of grain and produce department, drunk and disorderly in street, for which he was fined); Nolan v. Danks (1842) 1 Rob. (La.) 332 (drunkenness of overseer of plantation sufficient even without the stipulation against drinking embodied in the contract of hiring).

In Brownell v. Ehrich (1899) 43 App. Div. 369, 60 N. Y. Supp. 112, leave to appeal denied in (1899) 44 App. Div. 630, 60 N. Y. Supp. 1134, where one of the grounds for the discharge of plaintiff, who was employed as a buyer and manager of a department of defendant's store, was the alleged immoral relation with a woman not connected with the store, the court held that such relation was not a sufficient ground for his discharge in the absence of evidence tending to show that the master's business was or was likely to be injuriously affected thereby. But the court says obiter: "Even in an employment of this character, we are clear that, if a superintendent or foreman used his position to debauch or corrupt the morals of a female employee, his discharge by the master would be not only justifiable, but an imperative duty."

One contracting to superintend mining property impliedly contracts that he will conduct himself in and around the premises with ordinary decency, and if he kept dissolute women on the premises and was guilty of immoral conduct with them, it was sufficient ground for his discharge. Moynahan v. Interstate Min. Mill. & Development Co. (1903) 31 Wash. 417, 72 Pac. 81.

One employed as manager of a manufacturing drug business was properly discharged upon its being ascertained that he was manufacturing and selling drugs for illegal purposes. Kidd v. American Pill & Medicine Co. (1894) 91 Iowa, 261, 59 N. W. 41.

Proof of several acts of deception, misrepresentation, and fraud on the part of one employed as sales manager, a position requiring uprightness and personal integrity, was sufficient to warrant his discharge. London v. G. A. Kelly Plow Co. (1913) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 155 S. W. 556.

Introduction of gambling into a hotel by the manager thereof was sufficient ground for his discharge. Wyatt v. Brown (1897) — Tenn. —, 42 S. W. 478.

One employed as manager in certain cities of the business of a commercial rating agency, having charge of ratings and oversight over employees, and being intrusted with a power of attorney enabling him to have command of all the funds of the company passing through his hands, was properly discharged for refusing to give up speculating on margins in the stock and grain exchanges, by which he had lost his private fortune and incurred debts. Priestman v. Bradstreet (1889) 15 Ont. Rep. 558.

AUNT JEMIMA MILLS COMPANY, Appt.,
v.
RIGNEY & COMPANY.

Estoppel — acquiescence — use of trademark.

1. A written statement by an owner of a trademark that he supposed the mark might be used on other classes of goods without violating any law does not amount to an acquiescence in such use of the mark which will amount to an estoppel to object thereto. For other cases, see Estoppel, III. g, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — As to use of tradename or trademark on articles other than those to which it is applied by the owner, see annotation following this case, post, 1044.

Trademark — use on other articles.

2. A trademark adopted for use on pancake flour cannot be used by another person for a different but correlated article, such as syrup or sugar cream.

For other cases, see Trademarks, IV. in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — delay — effect.

3. A delay of eight years in applying for relief from the wrongful use of a trademark will not prevent the issuance of an injunction against further use, but will defeat a right to an accounting for damages and profits.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, I. b, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Mr. F. F. Crampton for appellees.

Ward, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an appeal from a decree of the United States district court for the eastern district of New York dismissing the complainant's bill for infringement of trademark and for unfair competition, on the ground that the goods manufactured by the parties respectively are different: viz., self-rising flour by the complainant and pancake syrup by the defendants.

The Davis Milling Company, of St. Joseph, Missouri, originated the trademark, which consists of the words "Aunt Jemima's," accompanying the picture of a negress laughing, in 1899, as we infer from the statement and declaration accompanying the registered trademark taken out in the United States Patent Office April 3, 1906, for self-rising flour. February 1, 1914, the milling company sold out its business, trademarks, and good will to the Aunt Jemima Mills Company, the complainant in this case.

Since February 15, 1908, Rigney & Company, the defendants, have used the trademark precisely like the complainant's, which was registered December 29, 1908, in the Patent Office on an application filed March 6, 1908, for certain syrups and sugar creams. March 14, 1908, as soon as the application came to its attention, the milling company wrote to Rigney & Company as follows:

St. Joseph, Mo.
March 14, 1908.

Rigney & Co.,
Brooklyn, N. Y.
Gentlemen:—

We have your letter of the 5th. We are surprised to have you use the name "Aunt Jemima" for your syrup, but presume you can do so without violating any law in the matter. Mr. Jackson wrote us about this, but we did not know that you were going to do it right "hot off the pan" as one might say. We thought you were going to wait to hear from us. We note you say you have copyrighted "Aunt Jemima." Were you able to obtain a copyright of "Aunt Jemima" for maple syrup, or did you simply register it as a trademark? The sample which you sent us has been received, and it is, as far as we can see, a very fine article. The looks of the Aunt Jemima Pancake Cream, as you call it, is not as good as the taste. The looks we think could be improved perhaps. Do you make this in a syrup as well as in the cream? Do you work the trade entirely through brokers, or do you handle it with salesmen working the retail trade? Would you be interested (sic) in taking on a pancake flour proposition along with your maple syrup and other lines? If so, we might have something of interest for you.

Yours truly,
The Davis Milling Co.,
Robert R. Clark.

It is perfectly clear that Rigney & Company adopted the trademark (though with full knowledge of the complainant's prior use) upon the advice of counsel and in full belief that they had a right to use it for their specific products. They brought it to the attention of the milling company, the complainant's predecessor, a little over two weeks after they had selected it, and one day before they filed their application for registration in the Patent Office.

The above letter is obviously no evidence of abandonment or of nonuser by the complainant, but the defendants say it is an acquiescence in their use of the trademark for syrups. We do not so construe it. The complainant was speaking of a matter of law, and said it "presumed" that the defendants could do so without violating any law. But if, as matter of law, the defendants had no right to use the trademark, this expression of opinion by the complainant does not make the law other than it is, nor estop it from relying on the law as it really is. Bigelow on Estoppel, p. 634. Indeed, the complainant seems, in addition to have been misled by the defendants as to the facts, because the letter goes on to say that the defendants had written they had copyrighted the trademark, and to ask whether they meant that they had registered it in the Patent Office. No reply to this letter was ever received. If the complainant had authorized the defendants to use the mark, or even had said it did not object to their doing so, mistake of law would not save it. When, however, it merely expressed a legal opinion, it did nothing to mislead the defendants, and they took the risk of acting on that opinion if it were erroneous. The bill was filed in December, 1915.

This brings us to inquire what the law on the subject really is. We find no case entirely like the present. In Hanover Star Mill. Co. v. Allen & W. Co. L.R.A.1916D, 136, 125 C. C. A. 515, 208 Fed. 513, affirmed in Hanover Star Mill. Co. v. Metcalf, 240 U. S. 403, 60 L. ed. 713, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 357, which was also said by Mr. Justice Pitney to be a most unusual case, it was held that a trademark is not a subject of property, and that even a technical trademark like the one under consideration will be protected only in markets where it has been established; that is, where it has come to indicate the origin or ownership of the goods it marks. In that case the trademark was adopted without any knowledge whatever of the prior use. The right to a trademark, though strictly appurtenant to the trade, becomes a property right as soon as it identifies the trade. When it gets this far, it is a mere question of words whether we say that the trade or the trademark is protected. Mr. Justice Pitney, in affirming this judgment, recognized an exception when he said: "In the ordinary case of parties competing under the same mark in the same market, it is correct to say that prior appropriation settles the question. But where two parties independently are employing the same mark upon goods of the same class, but in separate markets wholly remote the one from the other, the question of prior appropriation is legally insignificant, unless at least it appears that the second adopter has selected the mark with some design inimical to the interests of the first user, such as to take the benefit of the reputation of his goods, to forestall the extension of his trade, or the like."

To use precisely the same mark, as the defendants have done, is, in our opinion, evidence of intention to make something out of it,— either to get the benefit of the complainant's reputation or of its advertisement, or to forestall the extension of its trade. There is no other conceivable reason why they should have appropriated this precise mark. The taking being wrongful, we think the defendants have no equity to protect them against an injunction, unless they get it from a consideration now to be examined.

It is said that even a technical trademark may be appropriated by anyone in any market for goods not in competition with those of the prior user. This was the view of the court below in saying that no one wanting syrup could possibly be made to take flour. But we think that goods, though different, may be so related as to fall within the mischief which equity should prevent. Syrup and flour are both food products, and food products commonly used together. Obviously the public, or a large part of it, seeing this trademark on a syrup, would conclude that it was made by the complainant. Perhaps they might not do so if it were used for flatirons. In this way the complainant's reputation is put in the hands of the defendants. It will enable them to get the benefit of the complainant's reputation and advertisement. These, we think, are property rights, which should be protected in equity. We have held in Florence Mfg. Co. v. Dowd, 101 C. C. A. 565, 178 Fed. 73, that a manufacturer of hair brushes under the trademark "Keepclean," who did not make toothbrushes, is entitled to be protected against the unfair competition of one who manufactures toothbrushes under the trademark "Sta-Kleen." So, in Collins Co. v. Oliver Ames & Sons Corp. (C. C.) 18 Fed. 561, a manufacturer of metal articles, which had never made shovels, was granted an injunction preventing the defendant from putting the complainant's trademark on its shovels.

The defendants are a partnership, and did not incorporate the words "Aunt Jemima's" into their firm name; but the complainant seems to think that appropriation of a trademark is to be treated in exactly the same way as appropriation of a trade-name. The latter is a trespass of the same nature as is committed by one who applies another man's name to his own goods. This is a wrong which equity will enjoin without reference to the character of the article, or to the question of competition, L.R.A.1918C.

or of prior occupation of the market in any particular territory. No one has a right to apply another's name to his own goods. If, for instance, one were to publish a book on banking under the name of a firm of bankers, it would be no answer to say that there was no competition between banking and publishing, or that the bankers had sustained no pecuniary damage, or that the book was a good book. The act would still be a trespass, for which the bankers would be entitled to at least nominal damages at law, and, that remedy being inadequate and the trespass being a continuing one, they would be entitled to relief in equity. Such is our decision in British American Tobacco Co. v. British American Cigar Stores Co. 128 C. C. A. 431, 211 Fed. 933, Ann Cas. 1915B, 363, in which a company engaged solely in the wholesale tobacco business was protected against the use of a similar corporate name by a retailer of cigars, although there was no competition between them.

There are many decisions of the English courts to the same effect. In Eastman Co. v. Kodak Cycle Co. 15 Rep. Pat. Cas. 105, the complainant was a manufacturer of cameras under the name "Kodak." Defendant, under the name "Kodak Cycle Company," began the manufacture of bicycles, calling them "Kodak" cycles, and registered the name as a trademark for bicycles and other vehicles. The Eastman Company brought suit to restrain the use of the word "Kodak" and to rectify the register. The motion for injunction and the motion to rectify the register came on to be heard together. The motion to rectify was sustained, and the defendant's mark expunged, and an injunction was granted. Mr. Justice Romer said: "Then I have to deal with the application for an injunction against the defendants in respect of what they are doing. They have just started business practically, and it appears to me that to allow them to use the word 'Kodak' as part of the title of the Kodak Cycle Company, Limited, would be to give them the benefit of what, in my opinion, substantially amounts to an improper dealing on their part. It would be to allow this company certainly to cause confusion between it and the plaintiff company. I think it would injure the plaintiff company, and would cause the defendant company to be identified with the plaintiff company, or to be recognized by the public as being connected with it, and I think, accordingly, the defendant, the Kodak Cycle Company, Limited, ought to be restrained from carrying on business under that name. Moreover, it appears to me that they ought not to be permitted to sell their cycles under the name of the 'Kodak Cycles' for similar reasons. I think it would lead to confusion, I think it would lead to deception, and I think it would be injurious to the plaintiff company. I therefore grant an injunction to restrain the defendant companies, or either of them, from carrying on business under the name 'Kodak Cycle Company, Limited,' or under any name comprising the word 'Kodak' likely to mislead or deceive the public into the belief that the defendant company is the same company as, or is connected with, either of the plaintiff companies, or that the business of the said companies, or either of them, is the same as, or is in any way connected with, the business of the plaintiffs, the Eastman Photographic Materials Company, Limited. I also grant an injunction to restrain the defendant companies, and each of them, from selling, or offering to sell, any of their cycles or goods as 'Kodak.' I think that will sufficiently protect the plaintiffs. Of course the respondents, the defendants, must pay the costs, including the costs of the comptroller."

Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Dunlop Lubricant Co. 16 Rep. Pat. Cas. 12: In 1888 the word "Dunlop" was first used by complainant's predecessors to designate goods manufactured by them. Complainant made bicycle tires, rims, pumps, etc. One Funt started in business as the "Dunlop Lubricant Company," and dealt in oils and lubricants for bicycles, which he sold in packages bearing the word "Dunlop" in large letters. Complainant had never dealt in oils or lubricants. Held, that the use of the word "Dunlop" by defendant was deceptive, and it was enjoined.

In Valentine Meat Juice Co. v. Valentine Extract Co. 17 Rep. Pat. Cas. 673, the complainant used the word "Valentine" upon liquid meat extracts for medicine. Defendant used the word "Valentine" on beef extract used for food. An injunction was granted.

Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Co. v. Dunlop-Truffault Cycle & Tube Mfg. Co. 12 Times L. R. 434: This was a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendant from using the name "Dunlop" as a part of its corporate style. Complainant was the manufacturer of pneumatic tires, defendant the manufacture of bicycles and steel tubes used in the manufacture of bicycles. An injunction was granted. Mr. Justice Chitty holding that the name "Dunlop" had been chosen by the defendants to create confusion in the minds of the public and make them think that the defendant company was connected with that of the plaintiffs.

Premier Cycle Co. v. Premier Tube Co. 12 Times L. R. 481: This was a motion for a preliminary injunction to restrain the defendants from using the word "Premier" as a part of their business style. Complainant was a manufacturer of bicycles and tubes used in their construction. The defendants stated that they were tube manufacturers and had no intention of competing with the complainant in the making of bicycles. An injunction was granted.

We do not think these authorities apply to the appropriation of a trademark.

As the defendants' conduct was wrongful, the complainant is entitled to an injunction notwithstanding the delay of some eight years in asserting its rights (McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828), but is not entitled to an accounting for damages and profits.

The decree is reversed.

Learned Hand, District Judge, dissenting:

The plaintiff's letter of March 14, 1908, does not seem to me an expression of an opinion on the law; the plaintiff does not profess to have examined its rights in the case, but to allow them to pass as between the parties, whatever they may be. Nor is there the least reason to suppose that, if there was a mistake of law, it was mutual. The defendant consulted the plaintiff as to its position, and the most that can be said of the reply is that the plaintiff explained its intention not to assert any rights upon the ground that it probably had none. If anything could better indicate that they meant not to examine the matter fully, I confess I cannot see what it was. Furthermore, I find in the letter not only complete acquiescence, but in substance an invitation to co-operate with the defendant in the very infringement itself. The plaintiff's subsequent letter of retraction of May 1, 1908, further corroborates this conclusion: at least it shows that it thought the defendant might interpret the earlier letter as I interpret it. This letter, after saying that the plaintiff had received no answer, added that the defendant had overstepped the bounds of "business courtesy" in getting the benefit of their years of advertising. Therefore they formally protested against any continuance and asked for advices that the defendant would discontinue so that they might take up the matter legally and find out what their rights were. I cannot see how, in the face of this, it can be said that they were misled as to those rights. Of course, if this letter had been received, there could be no claim of acquiescence; but the proof is only that it was regularly mailed, and not received in due course. This does not make proof if its receipt.

Therefore, when the defendant after communicating with the plaintiff and getting their consent, as I believe, for nearly eight years built up a substantial business, the injustice is apparent of allowing the plaintiff now to assert its rights. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828, and Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. ed. 526, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143, do not support a contrary doctrine, even though they were not modified by Saxlehner v. Eisner & M. Co. 179 U. S. 19, 39, 40, 45 L. ed. 60, 76, 21

Sup. Ct. Rep. 7. Assuming that the theory of those cases is that time will never run against a fraud, surely it is wrong to say that, when the plaintiff on original inquiry as to its position acquiesces in the infringement, the defendant commits a fraud in going on. Creswill v. Grand Lodge, K. P. 225 U. S. 246, 261, 56 L. ed. 1074, 1081, 32 Sup. Ct. Rep. 822, seems to me a weaker case on the facts, yet the defendant succeeded.

I vote to affirm on the ground of acquiescence without expressing any opinion upon the plaintiff's original right:

Annotation—Use of tradename or trademark on articles other than those to which it is applied by the owner.

This note supplements notes on the same subject appended to Virginia Baking Co. v. Southern Biscuit Works, 30 L.R.A.(N.S.) 167, and Atlas Mfg. Co. v. Smith, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002.

In these notes the general rule is stated that the owner of a trademark or tradename will be protected therein as against the use thereof by others upon articles which, in their general characteristics, construction, or use, are so closely allied with products to which the owner applies the same, as to render it probable or at least possible that the general public may be deceived thereby as to the manufacturer or producer of the article. As shown in the notes referred to and as appears from the later cases, the courts are not in harmony in applying this rule. Thus in AUNT JEMIMA MILLS Co. v. RIGNEY, ante, 1039, it is held that a syrup is sufficiently related to a pancake flour so that the manufacturer of the syrup cannot adopt as his trademark therefor the trademark previously adopted and established by another to designate pancake flour.

On the other hand, in Virginia Baking Co. v. Southern Biscuit Works, supra, it is held that a trademark to designate crackers and small cakes may be adopted by another manufacturer to designate ginger snaps and larger cakes of a different class.

And it has been held that a moving picture film designated as presenting "Nick Carter the Great American Detective" in a detective story does not infringe the name "Nick Carter" as used to designate a series of detective stories. Atlas Mfg. Co. v. Street (Atlas Mfg. Co. v. Smith) (1913) 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1002, 122 C. C. A. 568, 204 Fed. 398, appeal dismissed in (1913) 231 U. S. L.R.A.1918C.

348, 58 L. ed. 262, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 73, writ of certiorari denied in (1913) 231 U. S. 755, 58 L. ed. 468, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 323, and (1914) 232 U. S. 724, 58 L. ed. 815, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 602.

Compare with Selig Polyscope Co. v. Unicorn Film Service Co. (1917) 163 N. Y. Supp. 62, holding that the phrase "The Rosary" having acquired a secondary meaning in the identification of a dramatic composition, and having become associated with the good will of the business established in the production of the play, it cannot be adopted by another to designate a motion picture film.

It has been asserted that, before it can be held that a similarity of marks will raise a confusion in trade, it must appear that the marks are to be applied to goods of the same general class and of the same descriptive parts; for the law places no inhibition upon the use of the same mark by different persons so long as the goods to which it is applied are so distinctive in class and quality as to forbid the probability of confusion in trade. G. & J. Tire Co. v. G. J. G. Motor Car Co. (1913) 39 App. D. C. 508, holding that rubber tires are essentially so different from automobiles that the trademark used to designate the latter may properly be adopted to designate the former.

In Florence Mfg. Co. v. Dowd (1910) 101 C. C. A. 565, 178 Fed. 73, a case referred to in AUNT JEMIMA MILLS Co. v. RIGNEY, it was held that the use of the term "Stakleen" to designate toothbrushes constituted unfair competition as to the manufacturer of toilet brushes who used the term "Keepclean" as his trademark to designate the same.

It is to be noted in this connection that cases are not included herein where the term or name complained of is not the same as that used by the complainant, even though it may be held that the name is sufficiently similar to preclude its use by a competitor on articles of the same class. A. G. S.

H. N. FINE et al., Plffs. in Certiorari,
v.
J. W. LAWLESS et al.
and
MRS. A. A. STRONG.

Injunction — against securing renewal of lease.

1. Injunction lies to prevent one who, in selling a business, sells the good will and assigns the leasehold of the premises where the business is conducted, from securing a renewal of the lease at the expiration of the term to the injury of the assignee.

For other cases, see Injunction, I. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Trust — renewing assigned lease.

2. One who, in selling a business, includes the good will and assigns the leasehold of the premises on which the business is conducted, will, in case he secures a renewal of the lease, be decreed to hold in trust for his assignee, although his lease provides that it shall not be assigned by the lessee or by operation of law without written consent of the lessor.

For other cases, see Trusts, I. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Landlord and tenant — assignment of lease — effect on lessor.

3. One assigning the leasehold of the premises on which a business is carried on, which he sells, together with its good will, cannot bind the property owner to renew the lease in favor of the assignee.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, I. c and e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — refusal to vacate — proceedings to dispossess.

4. The execution of a lease in reversion does not prevent the landlord from maintaining an action to dispossess the former tenant, who refuses to vacate at the expiration of his term.

For other cases, see Forcible Entry and Detainer, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

CERTIORARI to the Court of Civil Appeals to review a decree affirming a decree of the chancellor in favor of the defendant firm, and sustaining a demurrer of defendant Strong, in a suit to enjoin interference with complainant Fine in the enjoyment of the good will of the business sold to him and to restrain a lease of the building in which the business was conducted. Modified and affirmed as to defendant Strong; reversed as to the other defendants.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. L. Levine and Thompson, Williams, & Thompson, for plaintiffs in certiorari:

If one wilfully interferes with contractual relations existing between other and third parties, such person is liable in damages.

Donnelly v. Jackson Bro. 2 Tenn. C. C. A. 408; Dr. Miles Medical Co. v. D. Park & Sons Co. 220 U. S. 373, 55 L. ed. 502, 31 Sup. Ct. Rep. 376.

Mrs. Strong had no power to institute and maintain the forcible detainer suit before a justice of the peace, but such suit could be maintained alone by the new lessees, Lawless Brothers, provided they could otherwise maintain such suit.

Allen v. Webster, 56 Ill. 393; L'Hussier v. Zallee, 24 Mo. 13; McDonald v. Hanlon, 79 Cal. 442, 21 Pac. 861; Harris v. Halver-son, 23 Wash. 779, 63 Pac. 549; Capital Brewing Co. v. Crosbie, 22 Wash. 269, 60 Pac. 652.

Lawless Brothers should be bound by the strict letter of their obligation, and should not now be permitted to come back into this store building and operate therein the same kind of business which they had sold, with the good will, to complainants. If they should be permitted to do so, it would be an absolute destruction of complainants' business, and would make nugatory the effect of the sale of the good will.

Williams, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The bill was filed by Fine (and by his former partner for Fine's use) against Lawless Brothers, a copartnership, to restrain by injunction the defendant firm's interference with complainant Fine in the enjoyment of the good will of a business sold to him along with the stock of goods, which business for many years had been conducted by Lawless Brothers, at 222 Main street in the city of Chattanooga; and praying to be protected by injunctive process in the matter of a lease of the storehouse which at the same time was transferred to Fine and partner as purchasers of the stock of goods then in the building. Fine, by purchase of his partner, is now the sole owner of the property so acquired.

It appears that Lawless Brothers, in January, 1911, entered into a lease contract with the owner of the property, Mrs. A. A. Strong, for a term of five years. Before its expiration, January 1, 1916, to wit, on August 11, 1913, this lease was assigned to Fine and his associate; but the last named will not be referred to in the subsequent statement and discussion for the reason noted above.

Lawless Brothers opened up in the same line of business at 252 Main street, without objection or complaint on the part of complainant Fine.

The contract of sale by Lawless Brothers contained these conveying clauses which follow recitations as to the transfer of the stock of merchandise and fixtures:

"2. The lease which the said Lawless Brothers now have on the lot and store building at No. 222 East Main street, together with all rights thereunder.

"3. The name, 'the Wonder Store,' under which the business has been and is now being conducted, together with the good will of that name and the business."

Mrs. Strong assented in writing to the transfer of the lease to Fine, who, it was recited, was "to have the same rights under the original lease as are granted to Lawless Brothers," and the firm made a formal transfer of the lease.

On June 12, 1916, Fine wrote a letter to Lawless Brothers, stating that he had learned of negotiations on their part for a lease of the Strong premises, and protesting against the effort to "upset" him notwithstanding a promise made to aid the writer to get a renewal of the lease; and he stated that the effort to defeat him was an outrage.

Lawless Brothers proceeded, notwithstanding, to close a lease in August, 1916, identical as to terms with the old one. On October 18, 1916, while Fine's term was yet running under the assigned lease, the defendant firm announced to the public in a full page advertisement of a "removal sale" in the Daily News: "We're going back to our old home!" Incorporated in the advertisement as an "indisputable fact" was the statement that the firm was going to change their location of business to 222 Main street,—“the old stand they occupied for years,”—and “submarine prices on everything” were quoted.

Mrs. Strong was also made a defendant, and a suit, brought by her to dispossess Fine after January 1, 1916, was sought to be enjoined as one intended to aid Lawless Brothers in getting possession of the storehouse in violation of their contract with Fine.

The chancellor sustained a demurrer of Mrs. Strong, and that ruling was affirmed by the court of civil appeals.

The further rulings and the assignment of error in this court, so far as they are material, are sufficiently indicated in the discussion which follows. We shall not detail them otherwise.

I. As to the rights of Fine against Lawless Brothers:

The doctrine of "good will" has proved to be so salutary in effecting just results that it has been constantly expanding, with the result that the definition of the word itself has been broadened as the doctrine has developed. This was noted in Slack v. Suddoth, 102 Tenn. 378, 45 L.R.A. 589, 73 Am. St. Rep. 881, 52 S. W. 180, where it was said: "It is difficult to define what 'good will' is. Lord Eldon said that it was simply 'the possibility that the old customers will resort to the old place.' Crutwell v. Lye, 17 Ves. Jr. 335, 34 Eng. Reprint, 129; Moreau v. Edwards, 2 Tenn. Ch. 349. But in Churton v. Douglas, Johns. V. C. 174, 70 Eng. Reprint, 385, it was said that this was too narrow a view to take of it, and there it was said that it was every positive advantage acquired, arising out of the business of the old firm, whether connected with the premises where it was carried on, with the name of the late firm, or with any other matter carrying with it the benefit of the business of the old firm."

All definitions incorporate as one of the chief elements of good will the advantage accruing to a vendee from the old business stand,—the feature we have here to deal with. It does not appear that Lawless Brothers made any effort to use the old name, "the Wonder Store," after selling to Fine.

"Good will" is property in the sense of being a thing subject to be damaged and entitled to the protection of the law (Sanford-Day Iron Works v. Enterprise Foundry & Mach. Co. 138 Tenn. 437, 198 S. W. 258); and an injunction will lie to protect it when the seller of the good will thereafter wrongfully interferes with it or the property conveyed to which the good will is incident. 12 R. C. L. p. 995, and cases cited; Bradford v. Montgomery Furniture Co. 115 Tenn. 610, 633, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 979, 92 S. W. 1104.

When Lawless Brothers sold the good will of the business and transferred their current lease of the business stand, good faith required that they should not thereafter do anything which should tend to deprive their vendee of the benefits and advantages incident thereto.

A distinction may here be noted which will aid in the determination of the rights of the parties litigant.

Upon a sale of the good will of a business, without more, the selling party is not precluded from setting up a precisely similar business at another business stand in the same city, or even in the vicinity. If the purchaser desired to forestall such a step, he must expressly stipulate against it in the contract. Jackson v. Byrnes, 103 Tenn. 698, 54 S. W. 984; 20 Cyc. 1279.

But, without such a stipulation, the seller of a business and its good will is precluded from interfering with the purchaser in the enjoyment of the particular business stand which is transferred by him to the purchaser. There is implied in the contract of sale the agreement that the purchaser will not be disturbed by the seller in his right to enjoy all advantages that inhere in the premises used as the place of business. By implication of law the contract binds the seller not to do any act that would prevent the vendee's use of the stand, and all advantages incident to it, to the same extent and in the same way the vendor himself might have done but for the sale.

Decisions which deal with interference by the seller with business locations passing without such a stipulation, but as a part of the good will, are by no means numerous. The few, however, clearly make the distinction we have adverted to,—that it does not require express terms to prevent the seller from derogating from his grant of good will incident to business premises.

Munsey v. Butterfield, 133 Mass. 492, involved a contract for the sale of a milk route. It was there said: "A material part of the property to be delivered was, as stated in the agreement, 'the good will of said Munsey's milk route lying in West Somerville, East Somerville, North Somerville, and Charlestown.' This contract, called a sale of the good will of Munsey's milk route, was really, like a sale of the good will of any business, an agreement by the plaintiff that he would retire from it, and would allow the defendant to enjoy the benefits and advantages of it, and would do nothing to impair or injure it. This agreement was implied in the transaction, and in fact constituted the contract of sale of the good will of the milk route on the part of the plaintiff."

In Wentzel v. Barbin, 189 Pa. 502, 42 Atl. 44, where a paper route was sold and the vendor went over the route soliciting patronage which was formerly his, it was said: "When the defendant agreed to sell to the plaintiff 'all his right, title, and good will to the Oakland paper route, until now controlled by the said R. M. Barbin,' he became bound in honor and in law to carry out his contract in good faith. He was certainly not at liberty, especially after receiving a large part of the purchase money, to filch away from the plaintiff the veritable substance of that which he had sold. It was not like the setting up of another business of the same kind, but it was the taking away of the very thing he had sold that was complained of by the plaintiff."

The firm of Lawless Brothers was therefore under the implied obligation not to interfere with Fine as the vendee of their good will, in his use of business house and control of the lease during the period and the entire period of time covered by the assigned lease. But this does not mean that they had a right to negotiate for themselves, during that time, a renewal which would be valid simply because it should take effect at the expiration of the assigned lease.

One of the incidents and advantages of the good will of the business sold to Fine, as well as of the lease transferred to him, was that of the opportunity or chance to obtain for himself, as tenant in possession, a renewal of the lease covering such future term. It is true that the original lease contained no stipulation for a privilege of renewal in favor of the tenant, and it is furthermore true that neither Lawless Brothers nor Fine had any legal right to demand of the landlord a renewal on expiration.

However, courts of equity have long been accustomed to treat the tenant in possession as having an advantage or quasi right, called "tenant right," in respect of the renewal of his lease. He has an interest, less than an estate or legal right, which equity recognizes as having substance and value and which it will protect. This principle was contended for in an able argument by Sir Francis Hargrave in Lee v. Vernon, 5 Bro. P. C. 14 [10th ed. 1803] 2 Eng. Reprint, 503, which was followed by the court. He said:

It has long "been an established practice to consider those who are in possession of lands under leases . . . as having an interest beyond the subsisting term, and this interest is usually denominated the tenant right of renewal, which, though according to language and ideas strictly legal, is not any certain, or even contingent, estate, but only a chance, there being no means of compelling a renewal, yet is so adverted to in all transactions relative to lease hold property, that it influences the price in sales, and is often an inducement to accept of it in mortgages and settlements . . ."

"This 'tenant right' of renewal, as it is termed, however imperfect and contingent in its nature, being still a thing of value, ought to be protected by the courts of justice, and when those who are entitled to its incidental advantages, whether by purchase or other derivation, are disappointed of them by fraud, imposition, misrepresentation, or unfair practice of any kind it is fit and reasonable that this injury . . . should have redress."

In McCourt v. Singers-Bigger, 76 C. C. A. 73, 145 Fed. 103, 7 Ann. Cas. 287, it was said: "The likelihood of being able to secure such an extension under like circumstances is so great that it has come to be recognized as a valuable incident to the tenant's estate, a species of property which the law protects."

The modern cases which enforce this doctrine are collated, and the principle incorporated in the text, in 16 R. C. L. p. 903.

Sometimes the same equitable end has been reached, and protection to the quasi right of the tenant afforded, on the concept that the old lease in a sense gives birth to the new one, and that therefore the holder of the original lease has a claim to such protection by the courts.

Thus, Lord Chancellor Cottenham, in Clegg v. Fishwick, 1 Macn. & G. 294, 41 Eng. Reprint, 1278, says that "the old lease was the foundation of the new lease, the tenant right of renewal arising out of the old lease giving the partners the benefit of this new lease."

And in Spiess v. Rosswog, 63 How. Pr. 401, affirmed in 96 N. Y. 651, it was said that the so-called expectation of renewal is a part of the value of a lease. "This is deemed so actual and vital that when a new lease is had it is considered to be a graft upon the old."

Possessed as Fine was of this measure of right in the eyes of equity, has the defendant firm disregarded and invaded it so as to call for equitable intervention?

The chancellor thought not, and in his final decree so held, but expressed dissatisfaction that he could not rule to the contrary and be justified by authority. He expressed in distinct terms the view that Lawless Brothers were not "morally right in getting for themselves a renewal of the lease." The court of civil appeals in its opinion states that "it is inequitable for Lawless Brothers to retake that which they sold."

The decrees of the lower courts in dissolving the injunction originally issued and allowing that firm to take the benefits of the renewal lease and use the storehouse are based upon a misconception. The arm of equity is not too weak to reach to and remedy that which is inequitable and more,—a fraud upon the rights of Fine. If precedents were lacking, the time is ripe for the making of one; but they are not lacking.

Since the expectancy or chance of renewal in favor of Fine as the holder of the current term is regarded in equity as a valuable interest, the doctrine from an early date has been that Lawless Brothers, standing in at least a quasi fiduciary relation to him (under obligation not to interfere with him in the exercise of the "tenant right"), may not secure for that firm and hold against him a renewal. The new lease will be treated as held in trust for Fine, as the person having the beneficial interest in the foundation lease upon which the renewal might have been grafted.

This doctrine of so holding in trust was first announced in 1670 in the case of Holt v. Holt, 1 Ch. Cas. 190, 22 Eng. Reprint, 756, 2 Vern. 322, 23 Eng. Reprint, 808, and it has been consistently followed both in England and in this country. 16 R. C. L. p. 904, and cases cited. Referring to the fairly analogous instance of renewal of a lease by one partner for his own benefit of a lease held by his firm, it is said in this recent work: "The lease so taken inures to the benefit of the firm, the partner taking it holding as a constructive trustee. When the lease is held by a partnership, the chance or opportunity of renewal is in itself a distinct asset of the partnership in which all the partners have an interest; and where the partnership is for a limited L.R.A.1918C.

time it is nevertheless held that one partner has no right as against his copartner to take a new lease to commence after the expiration of the partnership by its own limitations." [p. 906.]

As expressed in Mitchell v. Reed, 61 N. Y. 123, 19 Am. Rep. 252: "The defendant was in possession as a member of the firm, and the firm owned the good will for a renewal, which ordinarily attaches to the possession. . . . He must hold them for the firm." (Italics ours.)

The doctrine is not confined to cases where leases are renewed by persons occupying fiduciary relations, in the strict sense. We have been cited, and our investigation has discovered, no case decided by a court of last resort in which it has been applied to a lessee who in similar circumstances has assigned for the balance of his unexpired term.

In Bennett v. Vansyckel, 4 Duer, 462, it was held that, where a lessee sublets with an express agreement that the sublessees should have the benefit of the good will of the lease, a secret renewal by the original lessee (the sublessor) taken from the landlord inures to the benefit of the sublessees; and in Crook v. Crook, 20 Abb. N. C. 249, it was ruled that, where a lessee assigned his lease to another who conducted his business on the demised premises, a renewal taken by the original lessee in his own name prior to the expiration of the lease must be held as in trust for his assignee.

It cannot be, on considerations of common honesty, that a transfer of the good will, embracing an assignment of the lease, will admit of the seller's "running under" him whose money he has taken, and ousting him of a substantial part of that which was conveyed. The chance or opportunity to procure a renewal may not be taken away from such a purchaser at any time pending the transferred term. During the whole of that term Fine's tenant right to renew was not to be subverted by the sellers. As said in Bennett v. Vansyckel, supra, in speaking of the assignor: "In respect of the good will, he was, in the full sense of the term, their [the assignee's] trustee; nor could he strip himself, without their assent, of the relation and its duties. It is true, he was not bound to take a new lease in his own name, for their benefit, but, without their consent, it was only for their benefit that he could take it at all." "It was a breach of good faith, and of the trust and confidence which the plaintiffs reposed in him, and was therefore, according to the established doctrine of equity, a fraud the fruits of which he cannot be permitted to retain."

Even the refusal of the landlord to renew the lease to or for the benefit of such cestui que trust does not, necessarily or ordinarily, entitle the assignor to take a renewal for himself.

If the rule were otherwise, ample room would be left for collusion which it might be difficult for the cestui que trust to expose. No such burden should be placed on the cestui que. It was said by Lord Chancellor King, in Keech v. Sanford, Cas. t. King 61, 25 Eng. Reprint, 223, 15 Eng. Rul. Cas. 455: "If a trustee, on the refusal to renew, might have a lease to himself, few trust estates would be renewed to cestui que use; though I do not say there is a fraud in this case, yet he should rather have let it run out than to have had the lease to himself. This may seem hard that the trustee is the only person of all mankind who might not have the lease, but it is very proper that rule should be strictly pursued and not in the least relaxed; for it is very obvious what would be the consequence of letting trustees have the lease on refusal to renew to cestui que use."

Chancellor Kent, in the case of Davoue v. Fanning, 2 Johns. Ch. 252, says of the decision in Keech v. Sanford, supra: "If we go through all the cases, I doubt whether we shall find the rule and the policy of it laid down with more clearness, strictness, and good sense. This decision has never been questioned."

Both cases, Keech v. Sanford and Davoue v. Fanning were cited with approval by this court in Neal v. Cox, Peck (Tenn.) 443.

The lower courts were in error, therefore, in holding that since the landlord, Mrs. Strong could not be restrained or prevented from renewing the lease to Lawless Brothers, by reason of that fact or by parity of reasoning the latter could hold under it for themselves and as against their vendee and assignee. This is a non sequitur.

The fact that both of the leases contained a provision that they should "not be assigned or transferred by the lessees or by operation of law without the written consent of the owner" cannot operate to affect the right of Fine to have Lawless Brothers decreed to hold the demised premises in trust. The trust relationship is forced on the firm from considerations of public policy,—to prevent persons in like situations from taking a benefit for themselves to the detriment of others to whom they are pledged not to do so. Mitchell v. Reed, supra. The quoted provision was meant to safeguard the right of the landlord. That right is a thing wholly distinct from the disability or liability of Lawless Brothers.

As already indicated, we are of opinion and hold, with both of the lower courts, that Fine may not through the medium of the trust relationship thrust by law on Lawless

Brothers, or of any assignment by that firm of its rights in the renewal, compelled by equity, force himself as tenant for the new term on Mrs. Strong. Her volition and her discretion as to the selection of a tenant, in view of the above stipulation in her contract, are not to be denied or overridden, further than is involved in the disqualification of Lawless Brothers to enjoy the fruits of their grossly inequitable conduct.

It appears that prior to the filing of the bill of complaint Mrs. Strong had brought a suit before a justice of the peace against Fine to dispossess him. That suit was enjoined. It is contended by Fine that the injunction should be perpetuated, the position advanced being that she was without status to maintain an action of unlawful detainer after she executed the lease in reversion, covering the new term, to Lawless Brothers. A lease in reversion is one which becomes effective only at the expiration of the term of the prior lease. The authorities in other jurisdictions are not in accord on the point whether, notwithstanding the execution of a second lease, the landlord remains clothed with such a right to the possession of the premises as that she may maintain a proceeding against the first tenant, who refuses to surrender. The conflicting authorities are collected in notes 120 Am. St. Rep. 36, L.R.A.1915C, 199. The rule, independent of any statute making special provisions to the contrary, appears by the weight of authority to be that, generally, the proceeding to dispossess may be maintained by the original landlord, on the theory that the lessee under a lease in reversion has no interest to that end until he gets possession; the duty remaining the landlord's to place his second lessee in possession. For the purpose of discharging the duty he may maintain a proceeding to dispossess the original tenant.

This court has not ruled the point, but the above view was indicated to be the true one in McNairy v. Hicks, 3 Baxt. 378, if the first tenant is holding under a claim of right. The intimation in Marley v. Rodgers, 5 Yerg. 217, is in favor of the landlord's right of action. We agree with the lower courts in holding that Mrs. Strong had the right to maintain the action of unlawful detainer under Thompson's Shannon's Code, § 5093.

The legal attitude of Lawless Brothers in this case—disqualification to take as against or to dispossess Fine—is itself a potent argument in favor of this right being yet in the landlord.

We do not find it necessary to discuss other assignments of error. The material rulings of the court of civil appeals, except as above modified, are affirmed. A decree will pass accordingly; but should Mrs. Strong deem it proper, in view of Fine's claim to consideration at her hands, to yet insist upon her legal remedy to dispossess, her right to have a writ to that end will be stayed for ninety days following entry of final decree herein. The injunction against Lawless Brothers will be made perpetual, and they will pay all costs of the cause.

Annotation—Right of assignor of lease as against the assignee to the renewal of the lease upon the expiration of the term.

"It has been a practice, particularly in leases from the Crown, from the Church, and from other corporations, to grant a further term to the old tenants in preference to strangers; and, as the expectation of renewal is rarely disappointed, such tenants are considered as having an ulterior interest beyond their subsisting term. This interest is generally, but improperly, called their tenant right of renewal; for a mere preference thus voluntarily given, in any individual instance, can never grow up into a compulsory obligation. A right to renewal can be founded only on the custom of the country in which the land lies, or upon express contract. Indeed a very great judge has said that an agreement by man having an estate of inheritance to make leases with covenant for perpetual renewal, each lease to contain the same covenant forever, is a species of contract not to be executed; a doctrine, however, which that learned judge never brought himself up to act upon, and which cannot possibly be admitted; for it has been so long held that such a covenant ought to be carried into execution, that, whether the judgment was originally right or wrong, it is so covered and sanctioned by decision that it would be infinitely too dangerous not to interpose a new rule in such cases. But, though independently of contract or custom, and merely as between landlord and tenant, there be no obligation upon the former to renew with the latter; yet the almost invariable recurrence of the grant to the same objects has begotten an idea of something like property, and men have been so far from treating this ulterior interest as precarious, that they have acted upon it, as if it were fixed and certain. Hence, leases of this sort are become a fund for settlements of every kind, for mortgages and other securities; and are subjected to the same limitations, and applied to the same provisions with the most permanent interests. This tenant right, as it is called, is recognized and protected by courts of equity in many instances. Hence, where a trustee, executor, or guardian avails himself of his situation, and gets a renewal of a lease for his own benefit, the courts will direct it to be for the use of the cestui que trusts, or persons beneficially interested in the old lease. So, where a person who has only a partial interest as tenant for life, mortgagee, or mortgagor, from the circumstance of being in possession, takes the opportunity of renewing, such renewal shall be for the benefit of the person entitled to the reversion. And according to the broad principles of equity, it should seem that wherever a grant of a reversionary term is obtained to the prejudice of the old tenant, by undue means, whether by suggestio falsi or suppressio veri, the party so obtaining it, though an entire stranger, shall not be permitted to hold it to his own use." 5 Bacon, Abr. Leases (U) pp. 676, 677.

This tenant right of renewal has frequently been protected where one partner secures a renewal in his own name of a partnership lease; it being held that the new term inures to the benefit of the old tenant, the partnership. See note to Knapp v. Reed, 32 L.R.A.(N.S.) 869.

In Phyfe v. Wardell (1835) 5 Paige (N. Y.) 268, 28 Am. Dec. 430, this tenant right of renewal was recognized and used as the basis for protecting the rights of the assignor and his subtenant against the assignee, who had secured a renewal and then refused to recognize the subtenant under the renewal. It was held that, for the purpose of protecting these interests, the renewal was but a continuance of the old lease. This case, of course, like many others that recognize and protect the tenant right of renewal, is not within the scope of the present note. It is cited here as illustrative of the general principle, the soundness of which has never been questioned. The rule is particularly applicable in cases in which the person who secures the renewal for himself is prior thereto in some position of trust respecting the lessee. A prior position of trust, however, is not the determining factor. The rule will be applied in any case in which the person securing the renewal is enabled to do so because of his connection with the lease, if such connection was such as to create a fiduciary relation between him and the tenant who seeks to renew. Or, as was the case in Lee v. Vernon (1776) 5 Bro. P. C. 10, 2 Eng. Reprint, 500, where the renewal was secured by fraud or misrepresentation, the rule will be applied.

But no case has been found in which the lessee's assignee has been protected in his tenant right to renew as against the lessee who has secured the renewal for himself, unless some other element or circumstance entered creating more of a fiduciary relation between the parties than exists by virtue of the assignment. Thus in FINE v. LAWLESS, ante, 1045, the assignee was also the vendee of the assignor's business carried on in the premises, together with its good will. Whether the right would have been protected in the absence of this added element is at least problematical.

In Bennett v. Vansyckel (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 462 (appeal dismissed in (1859) 18 N. Y. 481) there was a supplementary agreement, which the court treated as part of the sublease, in which the lessee agreed to give to the sublessee "all the advantages of being your [lessor's] tenants, as regards future renting, etc." The court held that this could refer to nothing else than the tenant right, so that the lessee was in equity obliged to transfer the new lease in accord with his expressed agreement. It also pointed out the fact that the plaintiffs were undertenants of defendant, and not assignees. In McDonald v. Fiss (1900) 54 App. Div. 489, 67 N. Y. Supp. 34, the court explained the Bennett Case as follows: "In the case of Bennett v. Vansyckel (1855) 4 Duer (N. Y.) 462, the good will of a lease or the tenant right was recognized as an interest of value which a court of equity would protect; and the assignor of a lease, who had, before its expiration, taken out a renewal in his own name, was decreed to hold it as trustee for his assignee; but the relief was granted in that case solely upon the ground that at the time of the assignment of the lease Vansyckel, the assignor, had contracted with his assignee that he would give him all the advantage of being the tenant of the lessor as regarding future renting. The court held that the transfer of the good will of the lease was an essential part of the contract of the parties, founded on a valuable consideration, and relating to an interest which, although in reality no more than a reasonable expectation, courts of equity had long been accustomed to recognize and protect. It was a valid contract necessarily implying that no act should be done by the defendant to deprive the plaintiffs of the advantages it was designed to secure to them, and one which a court of equity was bound to enforce in the only manner in which, in consequence of the wrongful acts of the defendant, it was capable of being executed. The court said that the conduct of the defendant in secretly obtaining a renewal of the lease was a plain violation of the contract, and was, therefore, a fraud, the fruits of which he could not be permitted to retain. An appeal was taken by the defendant, but the judgment was affirmed upon the single ground that the defendant, by his contract, with respect to the good will of the lease, had placed himself in a situation similar to that of a trustee."

In McDonald v. Fiss (N. Y.) supra, some of the language used by the court would support the plain proposition that the assignee of a leasehold would not be protected against his assignor who has secured a renewal for himself, even though the assignor at the time of the assignment truthfully represented that the landlord was accustomed to renew the lease; but the actual basis for the holding was the fact that the renewal was not secured by the assignor, but by a company that had had no prior dealings concerning the lease, and the plaintiff utterly failed to show any collusion between it and his assignor. A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County, in defendant's favor, in an action brought to recover damages for the death of plaintiff's intestate, alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. New trial granted.

Statement by Walker, J.:

The son of the plaintiff, who was named Bub Raines, was employed by the defendant as a member of the section crew on its line between Asheville, North Carolina, and Spartanburg, South Carolina, and at the time of the accident he had been sent out to flag an approaching train. In attempting to do so he was struck by the train and killed. At the time he was between fifteen and sixteen years old. With reference to his contributory negligence, the court instructed the jury as follows: "If he sat down near the track in a dangerous position, if you find he thought that he was far enough away, if he put himself in a perilous position on the railroad track, and he was killed, the court charges you that he would be guilty of contributory negligence, and it would be your duty to answer the second issue, 'Yes.'"

Upon the third issue, as to damages, the court charged the jury as follows: "There is no presumption in law that Bub Raines would have contributed to the support of his father after he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and the burden is on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury by the greater weight of the testimony that he would have continued to contribute to the support of his father after he arrived at the age of twenty-one years; and the burden is also upon the plaintiff to satisfy the jury as to the amount of the contribution he would have made to his father after arriving at the age of twenty-one years, and, unless the jury are satisfied by the greater weight of the testimony that he would have contributed to the support of his father after reaching the age of twenty-one years, then the jury could only award in this case, if they come to the issue of damages, the present value of such contributions as you find from the evidence Bub Raines would have made to his father from the time he was killed until he reached the age of twenty-one years."

Exceptions were duly taken to these instructions and each of them. The jury returned the following verdict:

"(1) Was the plaintiff's intestate, Bub Raines, killed by the negligence of the defendant, Southern Railway Company, as alleged in the complaint? Answer: Yes.

"(2) Did the plaintiff's intestate, Bub Raines, by his own negligence contribute to his death, as alleged in the answer? Answer: Yes.

"(3) What amount, if any, is the plaintiff entitled to recover? Answer: $192."

Judgment was entered thereon, and plaintiff appealed.

Messrs. Jones & Williams for appellant.
Messrs. Martin, Rollins, & Wright for appellee.

Walker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The charge as to contributory negligence and damages was erroneous. If the plaintiff was young and inexperienced, and was not provided with the means of giving the signal, with due regard to his own safety, and by reason thereof he was killed while in the exercise of that degree of care for his own protection which a person of his age, intelligence, and experience would ordinarily have given under the circumstances, he would not be guilty of contributory negligence. Ensley v. Sylva Lumber & Mfg. Co. 165 N. C. 687, 81 S. E. 1010; Alexander v. Statesville, 165 N. C. 527, 81 S. E. 763. In the case last cited, we said: "The rule of law in regard to the negligence of an adult and the rule in regard to that of an infant of tender years is quite different. By the adult there must be given that care and attention for his own protection that is ordinarily exercised by persons of intelligence and discretion. If he fails to give it, his injury is the result of his own folly, and cannot be visited upon another. Of an infant of tender years less discretion is required, and the degree depends upon his age and knowledge. Of a child of three years of age less caution would be required than of one of seven; and of a child of seven less than of one of twelve or fifteen. The caution required is according to the maturity and capacity of the child, and this is to be determined in each case by the circumstances of that case,"—citing Murray v. Richmond & D. R. Co. 93 N. C. 92; Bottoms v. Seaboard & R. R. Co. 114 N. C. 699, 25 L.R.A. 784, 41 Am. St. Rep. 799, 19 S. E. 730; Washington & D. R. Co. v. Gladmon, 15 Wall. 401, 21 L. ed. 114; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745; Mangam v. Brooklyn R. Co. 38 N. Y. 455, 98 Am. Dec. 66; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 49, and other authorities.

All that is required of an infant is that he exercise care and prudence equal to his capacity. Robinson v. Cone, 22 Vt. 213, 54 Am. Dec. 67.

Examined in the light of this rule, the instruction as to contributory negligence L.R.A.1918C.

was too broad, and should have been restricted to its proper limits. If the decedent was standing too near the track, or at a place near the track which brought him within the zone of danger, and his exposure to injury was not the result of any failure to exercise that degree of care which one of his age and knowledge would have taken for his safety under the circumstances, his act would not necessarily be contributory negligence. He was not an intruder or "licensee," within the rule of some of the cases cited by appellee. If a person places himself on a track in front of a moving train, or too near thereto for safety, and does so wilfully or designedly or negligently, he must take the consequences; but, where the act was not wilful, and it was not so in this case, it must have been negligent, in order to authorize a finding of contributory fault on his part, and the negligence must have been the proximate cause of the injury. The court excluded this question of negligence from the consideration of the jury, when it gave the instruction that "if he sat near the track in a dangerous position, if you find that he thought that he was far enough away, . . . it would be your duty to answer the second issue, 'Yes.'"

The alternative proposition, that "if he put himself in a perilous position on the railroad track," it would be contributory negligence, if it was correct, did not cure the error, as we cannot tell by which branch of the instruction the jury were guided to their verdict. Tillett v. Lynchburg & D. R. Co. 115 N. C. 662, 20 S. E. 480, 6 Am. Neg. Cas. 121; Williams v. Haid, 118 N. C. 481, 24 S. E. 217; Edwards v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 132 N. C. 99, 43 S. E. 585. An error in the charge must be eliminated by a retraction of it, or a proper explanation, which will remove the wrong impression made by it; and the giving of another correct, but conflicting, instruction, does not answer the purpose, as it does not produce the desired result. If the deceased had fallen asleep on the track, his negligence in doing so would not be contributory, in a legal sense, unless it was the proximate cause of the injury to him, and yet the court charged the jury, in effect, that it would be. If, notwithstanding his negligence in sleeping on the track, the defendant's engineer, after he saw him lying there and became aware of his perilous situation, could, by exercising the proper care, have stopped the train in time to avoid the injury, and failed to do so, his negligence in not doing so would be considered as the proximate cause of intestate's death.

The Federal Employers' Liability Act does not, as we understand it, change the rule of law as to what is contributory negligence, except as to its legal effect upon the issue as to damages, an affirmative finding in respect of such negligence reducing the amount of damages as indicated in the act.

We are also of the opinion that there was error in the instruction of the court in regard to the measure of damages, and, as the question may be again raised, we will now decide it. The intestate, at the time of his death, was employed in interstate commerce, and the case was therefore properly tried under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. With respect to damages the court instructed the jury that the burden was on the plaintiff to satisfy the jury that the intestate would have continued to contribute to the support of his father after he arrived at the age of twenty-one years, and, further, that he must satisfy them as to the amount of such contribution as he would have made after his maturity. This could hardly be the rule intended by Congress, as such facts would be incapable of anything like accurate or even approximate proof. They depend so much upon contingencies as to be beyond the human ken. We cannot foretell what a man will do with his estate in the future, and therefore Congress, aware of this difficulty in making proof, required that the amount of recovery should be measured by the reasonable expectation of benefit which would accrue to the parent, or a dependent, by the continuance of the life in question. We think this part of the charge, in its general scope and tendency, was not in accordance with the correct principle to be gathered from the evident meaning and purpose of the act, and we have already so decided. Here the intestate was under no obligation to support and maintain his father. 29 Cyc. 1619. What he might do for him, in that way, would be voluntary on his part,—a mere gift or gratuity,—prompted, it is true, by filial devotion or duty, but nevertheless a moral, and not a legal, obligation. Dooley v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. 163 N. C. 454, L.R.A.1916E, 185, 79 S. E. 970. We said in that case, quoting from and approving the language of Justice Pollock in Franklin v. Southeastern R. Co. 3 Hurlst. & N. 211, 157 Eng. Reprint, 448, 8 Eng. Rul. Cas. 419: "If, then, the damages are not to be calculated on either of these principles, nothing remains except that they should be calculated in reference to a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit, as of right or otherwise, from the continuance of the life. Whether the plaintiff had any such reasonable expectation of benefit from the continuance of his son's life, and, if so, to what extent, were the questions left in this case to the jury. The proper question, L.R.A.1918C.

then, was left, if there was any evidence in support of the affirmative of it. We think there was. The plaintiff was old and getting infirm; the son was young, earning good wages, and apparently well disposed to assist his father, and, in fact, he had so assisted him to the value of 3s. 6d. a week. We do not say that it was necessary that actual benefit should have been derived; a reasonable expectation is enough, and such reasonable expectation might well exist, though, from the father not being in need, the son had never done anything for him."

Again this court says in the Dooley Case: "A person entitled to the benefit of the action may recover damages for the loss of a pecuniary benefit to which he was not legally entitled, but which it is reasonably probable he would have received except for the death,"—citing Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, 2d ed. § 159.

Mr. Tiffany has classified the losses which may be considered in assessing the damages, and the persons entitled to be compensated therefor. The first description of loss is principally confined to a husband's loss of his wife's services, a wife's loss of her husband's support and services, a parent's loss of the services of a minor child, and a minor child's loss of the support of a parent. But the statutes do not confine the benefit of the action to husbands, wives, minor children, and parents of minor children. The second description of loss includes the loss by the beneficiary of any pecuniary benefit which he might reasonably have expected to receive during the lifetime of the deceased by gift, and also the loss of any accumulations which it is probable that the deceased would have added to his estate had he lived out his natural life, and which the beneficiary would probably have received by inheritance. He then proceeds to say: "Thus the second description of loss may be divided into (1) losses of prospective gifts; and (2) losses of prospective inheritance. The loss sustained by a husband, wife, minor child, and a parent of a minor child may be of both descriptions. The loss sustained by an adult child, parent of an adult child, or collateral relative, can only be of the latter description."

We approved this elucidation of the act in Dooley's Case, in which Justice Allen so fully and clearly explains this new law, and cited in support of Mr. Tiffany's statement the following cases: Greenwood v. King, 82 Neb. 22, 116 N. W. 1128; Hillebrand v. Stans Biscuit Co. 139 Cal. 236, 73 Pac. 163, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 520; Dukeman v. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. 237 Ill. 108, 86 N. E. 712; International & G. N.

R. Co. v. Kindred, 57 Tex. 498; Hopper v. Denver & R. G. R. Co. 84 C. C. A. 21, 155 Fed. 277. The case last cited was much like this one. The action was there brought by a father for loss by the death of his daughter, who was killed by the negligence of the defendant in that case. She had not contributed anything to her father's support, nor had she rendered any appreciable service to him. He had, on the contrary, been at considerable expense in supporting, maintaining, and educating her. Judge Van Devanter, then circuit judge, now a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, said in regard to the father's right to damages: "Considering this evidence in the light of the natural influence or prompting of filial ties, we think it would have sustained a finding that there was a reasonable expectation of substantial, though not large, pecuniary benefit to the father from a continuance of the life of the daughter,"—citing several cases to sustain his view.

It may here be remarked that the Dooley Case presents facts in almost exact analogy to those we are now considering, as it was an action by the father for loss sustained by the death of his son. In this case it appears that the intestate was a boy of good health, earning $1.10 per day, and was contributing regularly to the support of his father. He was sober, industrious, and of average intelligence for his age. His conduct towards his parent tended to show that he was, in mind and disposition, imbued with a proper conception of his filial duty and entertained the proper affection for his father. The evidence in this case of a reasonable expectation by the father of benefit or pecuniary aid or other advantage of gift or inheritance, if the life of his son had been spared to him, was sufficient for submission to the jury. Before closing this opinion, we must advert to the recent case of Irvin v. Southern R.

Co. 164 N. C. 5, 80 S. E. 78, where it is said: "We held in Dooley v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. supra, that an action may be maintained under the Federal statute in behalf of a parent when there is a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefit from the continuance of the life of the child, although the child has not contributed to the support of the parent, and the authorities which support this principle also hold that evidence of contributions by the child to the support of the parent is material and important in determining whether such reasonable expectation exists, and in the assessment of damages which may be recovered, and, if such evidence is material and competent for the parent, the defendant may prove the contrary."

That case sustains our conclusion that the instruction as to damages was erroneous, and was in harmony with what is thus said in American R. Co. v. Didricksen, 227 U. S. 145, 57 L. ed. 456, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224: "The cause of action which was created in behalf of the injured employee did not survive his death, nor pass to his representatives. But the act, in case of the death of such an employee from his injury, creates a new and distinct right of action for the benefit of the dependent relatives named in the statute. The damages recoverable are limited to such loss as results to them because they have been deprived of a reasonable expectation of pecuniary benefits by the wrongful death of the injured employee. The damage is limited strictly to the financial loss thus sustained."

And the case of Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 228 U. S. 175, 57 L. ed. 785, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426, 3 N. C. C. A. 806, is to the same effect. We think that the law is unquestionably settled by those decisions as to the measure of damages under the Federal act.

Annotation—Presumption and burden of proof as to pecuniary loss in death action.

Actions to recover damages for negligently killing a person are statutory. As a rule, these statutes authorize the recovery of damages for negligently causing the death of a person in amount sufficient to compensate for the pecuniary loss either to the estate of the deceased or to the statutory beneficiaries, due to the destruction of the decedent's life. In a note in L.R.A.1916E, 142, it is pointed out that the term "pecuniary loss" is used in a broad sense to preclude the recovery of sentimental damages, I. R.A.1918C.

and that it is not so limited as to confine it to an immediate loss of money or property, but it includes the loss of prospective advantages of a pecuniary nature of which there was a reasonable expectation, and which were cut off by the premature death. As pointed out in the present note, the burden of proof rests upon the plaintiff in an action of the character under consideration to show the pecuniary loss to the estate or to the decedent's statutory beneficiaries. The requirement in this regard, however, is satisfied by vague and indefinite evidence in cases of the negligent killing of infants, since there is a presumption of pecuniary loss arising in favor of the parents. Generally such a presumption also arises in favor of a surviving widow and minor children. This presumption avoids the necessity at least of producing direct evidence of pecuniary loss, and, as pointed out in this note, in many instances it relieves the family of the deceased, whom he was supporting at the time of his death, of the necessity of introducing evidence as to many matters which would ordinarily be regarded as essential to show pecuniary loss.

One of the essential facts to be shown in order to establish pecuniary loss to the estate of the deceased or to his statutory beneficiaries is the decedent's age and life expectancy, and also that of his statutory beneficiaries where the action is in their behalf. As a rule, the life expectancy may be shown by the use of approved mortality or life expectancy tables. The admissibility of such tables in evidence, as well as the necessity for their use, is discussed in a note appended to Buehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. post, 1071.

As a rule, pecuniary loss is based upon contributions by the deceased to his statutory beneficiaries. These are generally made either from some business in which the deceased was engaged, or from his earnings in a gainful employment; hence the earnings of the deceased in an employment which he was following at the time of his death is a material question, and evidence relative thereto is admissible. For the development of this question with reference to the admissibility of evidence of the decedent's earnings in other occupations than the one he was pursuing at the time of his death, or of the earnings of others, and the right to have such earnings considered as bearing upon the decedent's earning capacity, see note appended to West Salem v. Industrial Commission, post, 1080.

The rule as to the admissibility of evidence as to the decedent's profits from his business is not as clearly settled as is the rule relative to evidence as to the wages which the deceased was receiving at the time of his death. Such evidence is very generally held admissible if the labor of the deceased was the chief element of the income; in other words, if the business did not require the investment of much, if any, capital. Where, however, capital entered largely into the business, it is denied that evidence is admissible as to the decedent's profits from the business to show his earning capacity. Although the rule is broadly stated in Spreen v. Erie R. Co. post, 1086, that evidence is admissible as to the contributions made by the deceased from a business for the support of his family, as distinguished from evidence as to the profits of the business, as a matter of fact, however, in this case the business of the deceased did not require the investment of very much capital, his labor being the chief element. For a consideration of the question, see note appended to this case.

In some cases the earnings of the deceased cannot be directly shown, and it becomes a somewhat important matter as to whether or not opinion evidence is admissible to show the value of the decedent's services. This matter is considered in a note appended to Seeba v. Manistee R. Co. post, 1096, from which it appears that the general rule authorizing the receipt of opinion evidence as to value has been applied in cases of the character under consideration, and opinion evidence has been received as to the value of the decedent's services.

As heretofore indicated, the relation existing between the deceased and his statutory beneficiaries very largely affects questions as to the character and sufficiency of evidence of pecuniary loss. This question, where the action is in behalf of the decedent's estate, is covered in a note appended to Nicoll v. Sweet, post, 1111; where the action is by, or in behalf of, the parents, in a note appended to Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Collard, L.R.A. —, —; and where the action is in behalf of other beneficiaries, the matter is covered in a note appended to Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Anderson, post, 1122.

Collateral kindred.

Statutes authorizing the recovery of damages resulting to designated persons from the negligent killing of a relative are generally construed to limit the recovery to compensation for the pecuniary loss suffered by such beneficiaries. To be entitled to recover substantial damages under these statutes where the beneficiaries are collateral kindred of the decedent, it is essential to produce evidence of pecuniary loss, for there is no presumption of pecuniary loss to collateral kindred by the death of a relative.<sup>1</sup> It has, however, been held that recovery may be had of substantial damages in behalf of collateral kindred without proof of specific pecuniary loss, and that from the general evidence in the case relative to the age, health, occupation, earnings, etc., of the deceased, the question of whether or not collateral kindred suffered pecuniary loss by the death of a relative is for the jury.<sup>4</sup>

Chicago v. Scholten (1874) 75 Ill. 468, holding that where the next of kin are collateral kindred, and have never received pecuniary aid from the deceased, proof of such kindredship will warrant the recovery of nominal damages; but where the deceased is a minor and leaves a father entitled to his services, the law presumes there has been a pecuniary loss for which compensation under the statute may be given.

And see Hillebrand v. Standard Biscuit Co. (1903) 139 Cal. 233, 73 Pac. 163, 14 Am. Neg. Rep. 520, holding that the rule that collateral heirs must show pecuniary loss does not apply to the parents of the deceased.

Compare with McClaugherty v. Rogue River Electric Co. (1914) 73 Or. 135, 140 Pac. 64, 144 Pac. 569, holding that pecuniary loss to the statutory beneficiaries may be proved as an element of damages, but such proof is not essential to a recovery.

Parents — (a) death of young child.

It has been frequently asserted and it is held by the great weight of authority, that there is a presumption of pecuniary loss to parents from the death of a young child, and there need be no specific evidence of pecuniary loss in order to entitle the parent to recover substantial damages.<sup>5</sup> This rule is not in conflict

The mother is the lineal kindred of her with the rule that the burden is upon the plaintiff in actions of this character to prove the different elements necessary to recover, including the pecuniary loss suffered by the beneficiaries. There is, however, a vital distinction between the evidence necessary to establish pecuniary loss to collateral kindred and that necessary to show pecuniary loss to a parent from the death of a child. The law does not require impossibilities.

It is recognized that it is not practicable in actions to recover compensation to parents for loss due to negligently killing a child of tender years to furnish direct evidence of any specific pecuniary loss, but that nevertheless it cannot be said as a matter of law that there is no pecuniary damage in such cases, or that the expense of maintaining and educating the child would necessarily exceed the pecuniary advantage from his continued life. Moreover, the statute authorizes a recovery of damages for negligently killing a person, and makes no exception as to children of tender years. In obedience to the spirit of the requirements of this statute as well as the natural dictates of humanity, and in accord with the common observation and experience of mankind, by the weight of authority pecuniary loss is presumed to result to parents from the death of a child, although of tender years.<sup>4</sup> And the jury have the right to act upon their knowledge and experience, and, without specific proof, hold that the services of a young child are of value to the parents, and to estimate such value.<sup>5</sup> While it is not the purpose of this note to consider the question as to the character of the evidence necessary or admissible to show pecuniary loss, as that subject is covered by son, and hence is presumed in law to have sustained actual damages by his death. Smiley v. East St. Louis & Suburban R. Co. (1912) 169 Ill. App. 29, affirmed in (1912) 256 Ill. 482, 100 N. E. 157; Nordhaus v. Vandalia R. Co. (1909) 147 Ill. App. 274, affirmed in (1909) 242 Ill. 166, 89 N. E. 974; Chicago v. Keefe (1885) 114 Ill. 222, 55 Am. Rep. 860, 2 N. E. 267.

Bradley v. Sattler (1895) 156 Ill. 603, 41 N. E. 171, holding that since a mother is entitled to the earnings of her son, where the husband and father is dead, she is entitled to recover substantial damages for the son's death without proving pecuniary loss.

<sup>4</sup> Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Barker (1882) 39 Ark. 491, holding that where the death of a person earning or capable of earning wages or of rendering service is the subject of an action, the amount he is earning or is capable of earning at the time of his death may be proved by witnesses as the basis of forming a judgment of probable future earnings; but where the death of a child incapable of earning anything or rendering services of any value at the time of his death is the subject of an action, the value of the probable future services to his parents during his minority must, in the nature of things, be a matter of conjecture.

Elwood v. Addison (1901) 26 Ind. App. 28, 59 N. E. 47, holding that where the father of a minor seven years old sues to recover damages for his wrongful death, the law implies a pecuniary loss for which compensation is to be made.

Baldwin v. Harvey (1915) 191 Mo. App. 233, 177 S. W. 1087, holding that as to a child nineteen months old, the natural value of its services during minority are not susceptible of exact proof, but the law as well as the express direction of the statute leaves it to the good sense, observation, and experience of the jury, guided by the facts and circumstances. The law allows the jury to presume that the child would be dutiful and obedient, and from that to figure what its services would be worth.

Predmore v. Consumers' Light & P. Co. (1904) 99 App. Div. 551, 91 N. Y. Supp. 118, holding that a parent is entitled to recover more than nominal damages for the death of a young child; Gorham v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1881) 23 Hun (N. Y.) 449; Oldfield v. New York & H. R. Co. (1856) 14 N. Y. 310; Ihl v. Forty-Second Street & G. Street Ferry R. Co. (1872) 47 N. Y. 317, 7 Am. Rep. 450; Prendergast v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1874) 58 N. Y. 652.

Atkeson v. Jackson Estate (1913) 72 Wash. 233, 130 Pac. 102, holding that to recover more than nominal damages for the death of a child of tender years, proof of special pecuniary damage is not essential, and recovery is not prevented by the probability that the cost of the maintenance of the child during minority would have exceeded her earnings.

In North Carolina, substantial damages are also allowed for the death of children of tender years, although there is no proof of any special pecuniary loss to anyone from such death. Russel v. Windsor S. B. Co. (1900) 126 N. C. 961, 36 S. E. 191; Davis v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (1904) 136 N. C. 116, 48 S. E. 591, 1 Ann. Cas. 214.

<sup>5</sup> O'Mara v. Hudson River Co. (1868) 38 N. Y. 445, 98 Am. Dec. 61, holding that the jury have a right to act upon their knowledge, and, without specific proof, hold that the services of a boy from eleven to twenty-one years of age are valuable to the parents, and to estimate such value.

Gorham v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (N. Y.) supra, holding that, in an action by parents to recover for the wrongful death of their six-year-old child, the jury may estimate their pecuniary loss, although there is no direct evidence of such loss.

another note in this series, it may be said here that the presumption of pecuniary loss to parents by the death of a child does not render unnecessary any evidence on the point, but obviates the necessity of producing any direct evidence of pecuniary loss, leaving the burden upon the plaintiff to produce only such evidence as may be reasonably possible, and from which the jury may assess the pecuniary loss. For example, evidence as to the age, sex, health, disposition, etc., of the child, and as to the age, health, condition, circumstances, etc., of the parents.

It has, however, been held that the burden of proof is upon the parents of a child of tender years to prove actual pecuniary damages resulting from its death, and, in the absence of such proof, only nominal damages may be recovered.<sup>6</sup> And recovery of even nominal damages has been denied where there was no allegation or proof of pecuniary loss to parents for the death of a child of tender years.<sup>7</sup>

In Georgia, where capability of the child to render services at the time of the death is essential to the right of recovery, it is held that there is a conclusive presumption that an infant less than two years old is incapable of performing services of value to his parents, and since the loss of services is the basis of an action by a parent for negligently killing his child, no recovery can be had for negligently killing a child under two years of age. It is a question for the jury whether a child over two years of age is capable of rendering services of value to his parents.<sup>8</sup>

—(b) for death of child having an earning capacity or earning wages.

Where a child is killed who was old enough to be or was actually employed in a gainful occupation, pecuniary loss and substantial damage will be presumed in favor of the parent.<sup>9</sup> And this presumption is not conclusively overcome by evidence that the decedent was self-supporting and that his parent resided in another state, and had demanded no pecuniary assistance from him for several years.<sup>10</sup> In order to recover in behalf of the parents of a boy who was working for wages, it is not necessary to satisfy the jury that the boy would have continued to contribute to the support of his parents after reaching majority, had he lived.<sup>11</sup> No pecuniary loss to parents by the death of a child need be shown where the damages recoverable are compensation for the life lost, and not merely the pecuniary loss to the parents.<sup>12</sup>

Widow and children.

While there is a presumption that a married man having minor children is supporting or aiding in the support of, his wife and children, and hence a presumption of pecuniary loss to widow and children by his death, nevertheless only such damages are recoverable as evidence on the part of the plaintiff shows to be the pecuniary loss to the widow and children, and the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show such loss, although the presumption of pecu-

Rep. 1, holding that to be entitled to have considered as an element of their damages for the wrongful death of their father, the loss to them of the moral and intellectual training they would have received from him, his children must show that he was fitted to furnish such training.

Where there is no evidence that the deceased father ever rendered any services during his lifetime in the superintendence of his family and education of his children, the jury are not to be permitted to take these elements of damage into consideration in assessing the loss to the children by the death of their father. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Gullett (1911) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 134 S. W. 262.

Compare with Texas Power & Light Co. v. Bird (1914) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 165 S. that the evidence as to pecuniary loss to the widow and children may not be in all respects complete does not preclude the recovery of substantial damages in their behalf; it merely affects the amount of such recovery.

For example, the mere failure to produce evidence as to the length of time the intestate would have been able to continue his earnings, and the portion of his earnings which was spent for the support of his wife and children, does not render it necessary that the jury should award only nominal damages, for it is the legal duty of the husband and father to support his wife and children, and, when ability is shown, the law presumes that the duty is discharged until overcome by evidence.<sup>16</sup>

It has been held that, to entitle the widow to recover more than nominal damages for the negligent killing of her husband, there must be evidence of pecuniary loss to her by his death,—that she received some support or pecuniary aid from him, or that she had reasonable expectations of future aid or support had he lived out his natural life;<sup>17</sup> and that, although there is evidence of the decedent's earnings, yet, where it appeared that he lived with his mother and did not contribute anything to his wife, or aid her in any way, she was not entitled to recover substantial damages for his death.<sup>18</sup>

Husband.

It has been held that the damages to a husband by the death of his wife are based upon the value of her services to him, and hence it is incumbent upon him to prove such services and their value.<sup>19</sup> It has, however, been held that the husband need not show that he suffered special pecuniary loss, it being sufficient in this regard if he shows the age of the decedent, her state of health, etc.<sup>20</sup>

To show loss to decedent's estate.

In an action to recover the damages to the estate of a deceased due to his being negligently killed, while the plaintiff is entitled to recover at least nominal damages, based upon the wrongful act itself, yet in substantial damages he is entitled to recover only for such pecuniary loss as he is able to show that the estate of his decedent has suffered by the death complained of. The burden of proof is upon him to produce evidence tending to show the different elements of pecuniary loss for which he seeks to recover.<sup>21</sup>

Thus, in a suit by virtue of a survival statute to recover damages for personal injuries to plaintiff's intestate by falling 20 feet, which resulted in his death, the burden of proof is on the plaintiff to show that decedent suffered pain during the fall, which occupied but an dence that the deceased had remitted to her between $100 and $200 during the period of over six years in which he had been in this country.

instant of time, where he became unconscious upon striking the ground.<sup>22</sup> And the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to produce evidence showing the suffering of the decedent for a substantial period of time in order to have that element included in assessing damages for his death through the negligence of the defendant.<sup>23</sup>

Where damages recovered for negligently killing a servant are to be distributed according to the Statute of Distribution, in an action by the personal representative of the decedent's estate, to recover for his death, it is not necessary to allege or prove that the decedent was survived by heirs at law, for collateral facts of this character, the existence of which, in most cases, is a matter of common knowledge, are to be presumed.<sup>24</sup>

Substantial damages may be recovered for the death of a child of tender years although it is impossible to prove what the occupation of the child would have been and the compensation which it would have received in such an occupation. All that is required of the plaintiff in this regard is to place before the jury such facts as shall support proper legitimate inferences, and leave them to determine the matter with the assistance of the knowledge and observation common to all alike.<sup>25</sup>

The subject of contributory negligence of children is discussed in the annotation fol-

Same — direct and collateral injury — distinction.

3. There is a distinction between the liability for injuries resulting from the work which is intrusted to be done and the liability for injuries occasioned by wrongful and careless acts done in connection with some collateral work or matter.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, III. b, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Negligence — failure to anticipate.

4. There is a natural presumption that everyone will act with due care; and it cannot therefore be imputed to a plaintiff as contributory negligence that he did not anticipate culpable negligence on the part of the defendant.

For other cases, see Negligence, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — failure to watch child.

5. It is not contributory negligence, as a matter of law, for a mother to allow her children to play in the dooryard while a telephone is being put in the house, and the necessary poles are being erected for the purpose. At the most, the question is one for the jury, and not for the court.

For other cases, see Negligence, II. b, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — action for death — mortality tables.

6. In a suit, under the statute, for damages to the parents occasioned by the death, by wrongful act, of a child three and one half years of age, where there is proof that the child, at the time of the accident, was in good health, it is not necessary to a recovery of damages that mortality tables shall be introduced in evidence, in order to prove the life expectancy of the deceased. Such tables are admissible both at the common law and under § 7303, Rev. Codes 1905; but their introduction is not indispensable. The courts also may take judicial notice of such tables, and may instruct the jury accordingly.

For other cases, see Evidence, I.; IV. r, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Trial — jury — negligence — unguarded hole.

7. The question as to whether it was negligence for a telephone company to leave unguarded a telephone pole hole  $4\frac{1}{2}$  feet in depth and 20 inches square, in the dooryard of a farmhouse, in which its servant knew that children were playing, is a proper matter for determination by the jury, under all of the circumstances of the case.

For other cases, see Trial, II. c, 8, e, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Negligence — child.

8. A child three and one half years of age cannot itself be charged with contributory negligence.

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Richland County in defendant's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Reversed.

Statement by Bruce, J.:

This is an action brought under the statute by Louis Ruehl, the father of and the administrator of the estate of Louis Ruehl, Jr., deceased, for and on behalf of the father and mother and sisters of the deceased, to recover damages for the death of the said Louis Ruehl, Jr., alleged to have been occasioned by the defendant by carelessly and negligently leaving a telephone post hole "without placing any guards over or above the same, and without taking any precaution of any kind to avoid" the accident. The evidence is to the effect that on or about the 1st day of April, 1910, one L. J. Christenson was president and manager of the defendant telephone company; that at about such time the company arranged to extend its line past the house of the plaintiff and to put a telephone therein; that the dwelling house of the plaintiff stood about 4 rods from the east end of the section line, on which was laid out a traveled highway; that before the holes in which the telephone poles were to be set were dug, defendant telephone company had caused the necessary poles to be hauled and placed along the route of the proposed extension, at about the places where the same were to be set, and had caused the places where it was proposed to have the holes dug marked or designated by sticks or broken lath; that on or about the 1st day of April, 1910, Christenson, on behalf of the telephone company, employed one Frank Zimmerman to dig a line of post holes along the said extension, and agreed to pay him 12½ cents for each hole; that Christenson told said Zimmerman what to do, and supplied him with the tools, and told him how to do the work; that the post holes were to be 4½ feet deep, and that this depth was directed by Christenson; that the spade used by Zimmerman was given to him by Shulke, the employee of the company who marked the holes; that the arrangement was that Zimmerman should dig a line of holes from Lidgerwood out about 2 miles, and the line of poles ran down alongside the highway for about a mile; that he commenced digging at the city limits and worked due east a mile, and in the evening had to go home, so took his tools over to Ruehl's house, and went horseback to town, and started at Ruehl's place and worked towards town; that, after finishing up that mile, he commenced next morning at Ruehl's house, and worked back and met the holes dug before; that the whole job was about 2½ miles long; that his arrangement with Christenson was that he should dig that line of holes, and should be paid therefor at the rate of 12½ cents per hole, to be paid when the job was finished and accepted by the company; that at the time of the accident plaintiff's family consisted of himself, his wife, and five children, the oldest child being at the time ten years of age, and the youngest about one year; that the deceased child was aged three years and five months; that on the day of the accident the weather was warm, and plaintiff's children were playing about the house and in the dooryard; that on the said day Frank Zimmerman dug a hole in which to insert one of the telephone poles, about 4 rods directly east from the plaintiff's house, and on or near the west edge of the said public highway; that the hole was partly in the highway and partly to the west, on plaintiff's land; that it was about 4½ feet deep and 20 inches across; that, when completed, this hole was left uncovered and unguarded; that Zimmerman finished this hole about a quarter after 8 in the morning; that he saw the children about ten minutes before he completed it; that when he had completed the hole he proceeded to dig another one about 10 rods from the first one; that they were with him when he dug the third hole, the second one from the one in question; that after he finished they walked with him a ways; that he did not put anything over the holes, or guard them in any way; that about ten or fifteen minutes before the child was found in the hole the children were with Zimmerman, and about three quarters of an hour from the time that he finished digging the first hole; that the plaintiff talked to Zimmerman two or three minutes while he was digging the first hole, and left when he had the hole about half done; that he then went into the field to work; that when he left, Zimmerman was still digging at the first hole; that when he left for the fields the children were all at home; that he thought they were in the house; that he did not see them in the yard; that Zimmerman did not say anything about covering the hole; that he (Ruehl) did not think or say anything about covering the hole; that the child was a bright, good, and healthy boy, and was his only son, and had never been sick; that Mrs. Ruehl was working in the house; that she saw Zimmerman digging the hole; that she knew that the telephone company was about to extend its line to the house; that she did not know how deep the hole was going to be dug, nobody had told her anything about it; that she did not miss her children at any time; that she could hear them talking in the yard, and supposed they were all right; that about an hour after the first hole had been dug, the deceased, Louis Ruehl, Jr., fell into the first hole head first, and was either drowned or smothered in the mud.

After the close of plaintiff's testimony, the defendant moved for a directed verdict, on the grounds (1) that there was no actionable negligence on the part of the defendant; (2) contributory negligence on the part of the parents of the deceased child; (3) that the hole in which the child lost its life was not dug by a servant of the defendant, but by an independent contractor. This motion was granted, and from the judgment dismissing the action this appeal is taken.

The word "result" as used in these definitions means a production or product of some kind, and not a service. One may contract to produce a house or ship or a locomotive, and such house or ship or locomotive produced is the "result." Such results are produced often, and probably generally, by independent contractors, but plowing a field, mowing a lawn, driving a carriage or a horse car, for one trip or for many trips a day, is not a result in the sense that the word is used in the rule. Such acts do not result in a product. They are simply a service.

The contributory negligence of the plaintiff administrator, or other beneficiaries named in the complaint, is a good defense.

Scherer v. Schlager, 18 N. D. 421, 24 L.R.A. (N.S.) 520, 122 N. W. 1000; Powers v. Harlow, 53 Mich. 507, 51 Am. Rep. 154, 19 N. W. 257.

Bruce, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The first question to be determined is whether the defendant, at the time of the accident, was acting through a servant, or by means of an independent contractor. On this point, John L. Matthews, the vice president of the company, testifies that Mr. Christenson was the vice president, and had charge of and was general manager of the construction work; that the company employed Shulke to mark the places where the holes were to be dug; that no one was employed by the company to dig them. Frank Zimmerman, on the other hand, testifies that "Christenson employed me to dig that hole. I spoke for the job, and he offered me so much a hole, and I did that. Christenson offered me so much a hole, and I accepted the proposition on certain terms. He paid me 12½ cents for L.R.A.1918C.

each hole. I worked for the telephone company off and on all summer. My directions were that the holes should be 4½ feet. I asked Christenson, and that is what he told me the depth was. I put no guard around the first hole I dug. I made arrangements with Christenson. The arrangement was that I should dig the line of holes from Lidgerwood out to the place, about 2 miles, and that line of holes ran down along the side of the railway for about a mile. My arrangement with Christenson was that I should dig that line of holes, and should be paid at the rate of 12½ cents per hole, to be paid for when the job was finished and accepted by the company; and under that arrangement I went ahead and did the work."

Q. The tools used in digging the hole belonged to the telephone company?

By the Court: Do you know that they belonged to the telephone company, or do you merely mean that they were given you by Christenson?

A. Why, they were not just exactly given me by Christenson. The tools were given me by Shulke. I don't know who owned them. I had a talk with Christenson at the time I made the arrangement to dig these holes, at the time Christenson supplied me with these tools. I had nothing to do with marking the place where these holes were to be dug. I was told to dig the holes where I found the stakes. Christenson told me that he would send Shulke out and mark the holes, and to dig them where the stakes were.

The defendant cannot, under these facts, escape liability on the theory that Zimmerman was an independent contractor. There is much confusion in the authorities as to what is and what is not an independent contract. Some hold that the service must be rendered in the course of an independent occupation; and that the work done must be done by one whose independent business it is to do it. Judge Cooley, for instance, defines the term "independent contractors" as follows: "Persons following a regular, independent employment, in the course of which they offer their services to the public to accept orders and execute commissions for all who may employ them in a certain line of duty, using their own means for the purpose and being accountable only for final performance." Cooley, Torts, p. 549. Other authorities make the distinction depend solely upon whether, in the transaction of the business, the workman is subject to the orders of his patron, both as to the manner of doing and the result of his work. Singer Mfg. Co. v. Rahn, 132 U. S. 518, 33 L. ed. 440, 10 Sup. Ct. Rep.

175. Nearly all of the writers, however, agree that, where a person or corporation undertakes to do work upon the premises of the owner, or of him who is in possession, and such first person intrusts the performance of the work to a contractor or workman, but does not, and is not authorized by the one in possession to, give the control of the premises to the workman or contractor, such workman or contractor will be looked upon as a servant of the first party, and not as an independent contractor. In other words, the courts are inclined to hold, and we hold in this case, that when the telephone company undertook to put the telephone in the house of Louis Ruehl, it impliedly agreed to put it in in a safe and proper manner, and not in a manner which would endanger the lives of the plaintiff and of his family. Anderson v. Moore, 108 Ill. App. 106; Perry v. Ford, 17 Mo. App. 213; Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. 52 Minn. 474, 38 Am. St. Rep. 564, 55 N. W. 52. There is much in this case which would lead us to hold that in no sense could the witness Zimmerman be held to be an independent contractor; and the general rule is that the burden of proof in such matters is upon him who alleges the fact. Midgett v. Branning Mfg. Co. 150 N. C. 333, 64 S. E. 5. Zimmerman testifies that he was in the employ of the defendant all summer, and that he did not furnish his own tools. A person is not an independent contractor merely because he is paid by the piece or by the job. Postor v. National Steel Co. 216 Pa. 279, 65 Atl. 618; Waters v. Pioneer Fuel Co. supra; Holmes v. Tennessee Coal, Iron & R. Co. 49 La. Ann. 1465, 22 So. 403, 3 Am. Neg. Rep. 174. Nor does the fact that Zimmerman was not to be paid until the job was satisfactorily completed alter the case. This would merely be evidence of the fact that the method of work was subject to the approval of the company. It is a provision which is implied in all contracts of employment. No laborer can recover his daily wage unless he can show that he has earned it. Even if Zimmerman could be considered as an independent contractor in relation to the digging of the hole, he was not an independent contractor in relation to the whole of the work, which was the digging of the holes and the placing of the posts therein. His work was but a part of a series of work. The posts were on the ground, to be put in by someone else. All that we learn of his contract was that he should dig the post holes. If the contract presupposed this, and this alone, it would presuppose the construction of dangerous pitfalls; and the principal would be liable for them the same as if he had authorized an independent contractor to construct a wall or a building according to specifications which were inherently dangerous, and which resulted in the falling of such wall.

The rule seems to be well established that where, in the making of an improvement of any kind, it is manifest that injury is likely to result unless due precautions are taken, a duty rests upon him who causes the work to be done to see that all necessary precautions are taken. See Cyc. vol. 26, p. 1560, and numerous cases there cited. According to the evidence, the contract was merely to dig the holes, into which someone else was to place the posts when the proper time came. It is really immaterial, in this view of the case, whether Zimmerman was an independent contractor or not. It was the legal duty of the defendant to properly safeguard the holes. There is no evidence that the defendant transferred this duty to another. We are in serious doubt as to whether it could. Bower v. Peate, L. R. 1 Q. B. Div. 321, 45 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 446, 35 L. T. N. S. 321; Hughes v. Percival, L. R. 8 App. Cas. 443, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 719, 49 L. T. N. S. 189, 31 Week. Rep. 725, 47 J. P. 772. We consider the reasoning of the case of Donovan v. Oakland & B. Rapid Transit Co. 102 Cal. 245, 36 Pac. 516, as entirely applicable in the case at bar, and we adopt it as our own. See also Homan v. Stanley, 66 Pa. 464, 5 Am. Rep. 389.

There is a distinction between injuries resulting from the work itself, and where the wrongful or careless act is in connection with some collateral work or matter. A distinction is made, indeed, between a contract whereby the independent contractor is required to dig a deep pit or well, and a third person is injured by falling into that well, and a case where a contractor is authorized to build a house, which in itself is not dangerous, but while building it he drops a plank upon the head of a passer-by. In one case, the injury is occasioned by the subject of the contract itself, or the thing constructed under the contract. In the other, it is occasioned by an act collateral to the construction. Davie v. Levy, 39 La. Ann. 551, 4 Am. St. Rep. 225, 2 So. 395.

We are unable to find, as a matter of law, that the father was guilty of contributory negligence in this case. It is true that, before going to work in the fields, he talked with Zimmerman, who was digging the first hole, and that he testifies that at the time "he did not think anything about covering the hole," and that respondent's counsel not only seeks to argue contributory negligence therefrom, but a lack of negligence on the part of the defendant. "Why, then," he asks, "should Zimmerman think of it?"

The conclusion he contends for, however, by no means follows. Plaintiff had the right to assume that in digging the holes in question Zimmerman would proceed with due care; and at the time he left for the fields Zimmerman was in complete control, and the hole was not even fully dug. "As there is a natural presumption that everyone will act with due care, it cannot be imputed to the plaintiff as negligence that he did not anticipate culpable negligence on the part of the defendant." 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 4th ed. § 92, and cases cited. The duty to properly guard the holes was upon the defendant, and not upon the plaintiff.

Nor do we believe that it was contributory negligence, as a matter of law, on the part of the mother to allow the child to play in the yard. In considering such matters, by far the greater number of the courts have borne in mind the fact that "men must work;" that seed must be sown and housework done; that the hard-working mother of a family has many duties, and that the provider of bread must give a more or less uninterrupted attention to his labors; that it is only the few who have the means to employ a retinue of servants. At the most, and according to the great weight of authority, the question of contributory negligence was one for the jury, and not for the court. Garner v. Trumbull (C. C. A. Eighth Circuit) 94 Fed. 321, 36 C. C. A. 361; Mellen v. Old Colony Street R. Co. 184 Mass. 399, 68 N. E. 679, 15 Am. Neg. Rep. 79; Hewitt v. Taunton Street R. Co. 167 Mass. 483, 46 N. E. 106, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 444; Howell v. Rochester R. Co. 24 App. Div. 502, 48 N. Y. Supp. 17; Ehrman v. Nassau Electric R. Co. 23 App. Div. 21, 48 N. Y. Supp. 379; Muller v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 18 App. Div. 177, 45 N. Y. Supp. 954; Kitchell v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 6 App. Div. 99, 39 N. Y. Supp. 743; Jones v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 10 Misc. 543, 31 N. Y. Supp. 445; Karahuta v. Schuykill Traction Co. 6 Pa. Super. Ct. 319.

It is, of course, well established that a child three and one-half years of age cannot itself be made chargeable with contributory negligence. Rice v. Crescent City R. Co. 51 La. Ann. 108, 24 So. 791; Barnes v. Shreveport City R. Co. 47 La. Ann. 1218, 49 Am. St. Rep. 400, 17 So. 782, 11 Am. Neg. Cas. 636; Pueblo Electric Street R. Co. v. Sherman, 25 Colo. 114, 71 Am. St. Rep. 116, 53 Pac. 322. Even the most rigid rule would make the question one for the jury. Young v. Atlantic Ave. R. Co. 10 Misc. 541, 31 N. Y. Supp. 441.

But respondent's counsel contends that the judgment should be affirmed, because the L.R.A.1918C.

plaintiff failed to introduce any mortality tables in evidence, or in any way to prove the life expectancy of the deceased child. He claims that on this account the jury could only have found a verdict for nominal damages, and that where only nominal damages could be recovered the doctrine of de minimis non curat lex applies, and appellate courts will not reverse judgments for the defendant when a new trial would only result in nominal damages for the plaintiff. Appellant answers this contention chiefly by stating that the matter was not brought to the attention of the court below; and the failure to prove damages was not urged as a reason for the motion for a directed verdict. Both counsel are partially mistaken. The fact as to whether the matter was brought to the attention of the trial court at the time of the motion for a directed verdict is of no moment; and the rule is well established that, except in the case of what may be called "hard actions," and actions which involve title to land, or other than merely money rights, the appellate court will not reverse a judgment for the defendant when a new trial would merely result in the awarding of nominal damages. Raymond v. Edelbrock, 15 N. D. 231, 107 N. W. 194. The respondent, on the other hand, is mistaken in his assumption that it was necessary for the plaintiff to introduce mortality tables in evidence, and that the plaintiff failed to introduce evidence from which the value of the loss of the services and earnings of the deceased might be inferred. He proved the age of the child, and that the child was in good health. There was also evidence enough in the record for the jury to form a fair estimate of the business and occupation and the circumstances of the father. On these facts, the jury could base their conclusions.

After a very exhaustive examination of the cases and authorities, we fail to find a single authority which makes the introduction of such tables a prerequisite to a recovery of damages. Such tables, it is true, are admissible in evidence; and our statute (Rev. Code 1905, § 7303, Comp. Laws 1913, § 7922) makes the so-called "Carlisle Tables" admissible. But nowhere do we find authority for the proposition that their introduction is absolutely necessary. In fact, the overwhelming weight of authority is to the effect that the court will take judicial notice of the standard tables, and, if called upon, or even if not called upon, may instruct the jury in relation thereto. It would have been perfectly competent, in the case at bar, for the court to have instructed the jury as to the fact of the contents of such mortality tables; and the request for this instruction, of course, was not required to be made prior to or at the time of the motion for the directed verdict. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Phillip, 98 Ala. 159, 13 So. 65; *Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Anything that the court may take judicial notice of must be something which, from its nature, is or should be known to all men of ordinary understanding and intelligence, and such men the jury must be deemed to have been.

In the following cases, damages running all the way from $1,000 to $7,500 were awarded by the juries, and sustained by the courts, even though there was an entire absence of mortality tables, or even of an instruction upon the subject: Myers v. San

New York & H. R. Co.* 3 E. D. Smith, 103; McGovern v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 67 N. Y. 417.

On the main question as to whether the jury could infer negligence from the leaving of the post holes unprotected, we hold that it could. The first hole was completed at least three quarters of an hour before the time of the accident. Zimmerman knew that children were playing, or liable to play, in the yard. This they had a perfect right to do. The question, in the main, is one for the jury, and not one for the court.

The judgment of the District Court is reversed, a new trial granted, and the cause remanded for further proceedings according to law.

Annotation—Admissibility and use of mortality tables in death actions.

For other notes in this series relative to the admissibility, character, or sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss from the negligent killing of a person, see the note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056, where the different notes presenting different aspects of this matter are referred to at length.

In general.

In actions to recover pecuniary compensation, either to the estate of the decedent or to the statutory beneficiaries, for the pecuniary loss to the parties represented by the plaintiff from the negligent killing of the plaintiff's intestate, one of the important matters to be considered as affecting the damages recoverable is the life expectancy of the deceased, and in many cases the life expectancy of the statutory beneficiaries. Generally, one of the most practical methods of showing the life expectancy, either of the deceased or the statutory beneficiaries, is introducing in evidence life expectancy or mortality tables. As a rule these tables are based upon a record extending over a period of years, of the deaths among a stated number of people chosen without reference to their age, health, or occupation, the number of people included and the period of time covered by the record being sufficient to be fairly representative. Standard tables of this character, which are in common use, are very generally held to be admissible in evidence as an aid or guide in determining the natural duration of life of the person or persons whose life expectancy is the subject of inquiry.<sup>1</sup>

pectancy is the subject of inquiry;<sup>2</sup> or the fact that he was afflicted with a fatal disease which might at any time result in death;<sup>3</sup> they are also generally held to be admissible in evidence as to the life expectancy of the deceased, although at the time he received the injury resulting in his death he was engaged in a hazardous occupation.<sup>4</sup>

eral Employers' Liability Act to recover for the negligent killing of an adult, for the benefit of his parents, life tables are admissible in evidence in behalf of the defendants to show the life expectancy of the parents, and the plaintiff is entitled to introduce such tables to show the life expectancy of the deceased merely for the purpose of showing that it covered the period of the life expectancy of the parents.

Smiser v. State (1896) 17 Ind. App. 519, 47 N. E. 229, holding that life tables are admissible although decedent had been a sufferer from bronchitis and lung trouble, and drew a pension on that account, where, however, he had been able to work constantly.

Deer v. Suckow Co. (1915) 60 Ind. App. 277, 110 N. E. 700, holding that mortality tables are admissible in evidence to show the duration of the life of the deceased without reference to his health; that his poor health goes merely to the force and weight to be given to the table.

Memphis Street R. Co. v. Berry (1907) 118 Tenn. 581, 102 S. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Gormley (1896) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 488, holding that mortality tables are admissible in evidence to show the life expectancy of the deceased, although he was in poor health at the time of his injury which resulted in death.

But see Mississippi Cotton Oil Co. v. Smith (1909) 95 Miss. 528, 48 So. 735, holding that it is improper to admit in evidence life expectancy tables as bearing upon the life expectancy of a deceased person who was afflicted with a disease, where people suffering from such disease were not included in such tables.

Compare with Mississippi C. R. Co. v. Robinson (1914) 106 Miss. 896, 64 So. 838, holding that, where the decedent's only infirmity was deafness, mortality tables are admissible to show his life expectancy.

In Rafferty v. Buckman (1877) 46 Iowa, 195, the court expressed doubt as to the admissibility in evidence of the Carlisle Tables as bearing upon the duration in life of a man addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors.

As affected by the tender years of the deceased.

There is a conflict of judicial opinion as to the admissibility of evidence of mortality tables as an aid in determining the life expectancy of a young child whose age is not tabulated therein. It has been held that tables of this character are admissible in such cases not-

Cas. 140, holding that fact that the deceased was a locomotive engineer, and hence engaged in a hazardous occupation, did not render the Carlisle Tables inadmissible as evidence of his life expectancy, since such tables are not conclusive evidence, and that the degree of weight to be attached to them was for the jury.

Coates v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1883) 62 Iowa, 486, 17 N. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Toledo, A. A. & N. M. R. Co. (1895) 67 Fed. 73, holding that the fact that the deceased was engaged in an extrahazardous occupation, does not render inadmissible general mortality tables as bearing upon his life expectancy.

Culp v. Virginian R. Co. (1915) 77 W. Va. 125, 87 S. E. 187, holding that the fact that the deceased was a freight train conductor, and not a member of the class whose lives were included in a life expectancy table offered in evidence, does not render the table inadmissible.

Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Johnson (1900) 24 Tex. Civ. App. 180, 58 S. W. 622, holding that, although mortality tables have reference only to insurable lives, and do not include occupations of special risks, such as locomotive engineers, nevertheless such tables are admissible in evidence in an action to recover damages for the negligent killing of a locomotive engineer, since even in such a case it is of some importance for the jury to know the result of the statistics.

It has been held, however, that, where the deceased is engaged in a hazardous occupation, the pecuniary loss to his widow by his death is impossible of determination upon any scientific basis. Dobyns v. Yazoo & M. Valley R. Co. (1907) 119 La. 72, 43 So. 934.

withstanding the tender age of the deceased, for this fact merely bears upon the weight to be attached to the table, and not upon its admissibility.<sup>5</sup> In other jurisdictions mortality tables have been held inadmissible to show the life expectancy of a young child, where the lives of children of that age are not included in the table.<sup>6</sup>

The rule denying the admissibility of such tables is based upon the ground that the rate of mortality among children of very tender years is much greater than it is among children of more advanced age, and that hence a table covering the life expectancy of an older child would not be any guide as to the life expectancy of a substantially younger child, and it might be misleading.<sup>7</sup> It is to be noted that this objection can be obviated by the use of such tables as the Carlisle Table, for this tablet contains a tabulation of the lives of infants from one year old up.

The admissibility in evidence of these tables in cases where the person whose life expectancy is involved was not within the class included in the table, either because he was in poor health, afflicted with a fatal disease, engaged in a hazardous occupation, or was of an age not included in the table, where sustained, is generally based on the ground that these are matters which merely affect the value or weight to be attached to the table as a guide in ascertaining in a particular case the life expectancy in issue.

Conclusiveness of table.

Although admissible in evidence, life expectancy or mortality tables are not generally conclusive upon the question of the decedent's duration of life, or the life expectancy of the decedent's beneficiaries.<sup>8</sup> As a rule, they are admissible merely as a guide for the jury in ascertaining the life expectancy in accordance with the facts and circumstances of the particular case. In this regard it is very generally recognized that the life expectancy of the person is to be determined by the evidence relating to his age, health, habits, occupation, and such other matters as may be properly developed in the particular case. As a guide, however, in applying such evidence, these tables are very valuable, and are generally used.

In this regard it has been asserted that, while mortality tables may be taken as evidence of how long the deceased might have lived, this question, in an action to recover for his death, is for the jury to determine from all the evidence in the case and the observation and experience of its members. Compensation for pecuniary loss is the measure of damages, and there is no formal or fixed rule prescribed to govern the jury in its ascertainment.<sup>9</sup> And it has been held that life expectancy tables are not conclusive, and are far from satisfactory evidence, but they are admitted from necessity because they are the best guide obtainable to establish a material and necessarily uncertain fact,—the probable duration of the life of the decedent.<sup>10</sup> On the other hand, it has been held that mortality tables when received in evidence are controlling upon the question of expectancy of life, in the absence of evidence tending to show that the deceased had a probability of life greater or less than that shown by the tables.<sup>11</sup>

In Alabama Mineral R. Co. v. Jones (1896) 114 Ala. 519, 82 Am. St. Rep. 121, 21 So. 507, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 551, it is held that there is no method of ascertaining the decedent's life expectancy as a positive fact, for in any case the period fixed is necessarily an inference drawn from many conditions and circumstances.

In Hebert v. Lake Charles Ice, Light & Waterworks Co. (1903) 111 La. 533, 64 L.R.A. 101, 100 Am. St. Rep. 509, 35 So. 731, it is held that the mortality tables are simply an assistance to the court by way of estimate or approximation, but they have no absolute probative force. They may properly be referred to by insurance companies in making their contracts, but judgments of courts cannot be based absolutely upon them, for the earning power of the deceased would generally have to be exercised throughout a long number of years and under numberless contingencies.

In Speight v. Seaboard Air Line R. Co. (1912) 161 N. C. 80, 76 S. E. 684, it is held that it is proper to instruct the jury that, in determining the life expectancy of the deceased, the mortality tables introduced in evidence may be considered by them, but they are not binding upon them.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Schultz (1898) 9 Ohio C. D. 816, it is held that, in determining the excessiveness of a verdict, the court should not apply any rule from a table of probability, for the jury does not necessarily base their verdict upon fixed mathematical tables, and it is not the object or intention of the statute that they should.

<sup>9</sup> Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Higgins (1906) 44 Tex. Civ. App. 523, 99 S. W. 200, holding that the jury are not bound to take the mortuary tables as evidence of the probable duration of the decedent's life, but they may determine that fact from all the evidence in the case and their observations and experience.

It has been said that basing the damages recoverable for the benefit of the next of kin upon annuity tables and the expectancy of decedent's life is not a fair way to arrive thereat, since the amount of money which would purchase an annuity during the expectancy of life of the next of kin, equal to the annual contributions to their support by the deceased, would be excessive, for it must necessarily be lessened and cut down by contingencies which such cases present. Commercial Club v. Hilliker (1898) 20 Ind. App. 239, 50 N. E. 578.

And see Central R. Co. v. Thompson (1896) 76 Ga. 770, holding the tables prepared for life insurance companies do not contemplate at all the ability to work, and the length of time that ability will continue, and the amount it will decrease as age increases; hence they are not conclusive on the question of the earning capacity of the decedent, and the jury should be instructed in connection with these tables that these other elements should also be taken into consideration.

And see St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Needham (1892) 3 C. C. A. 129, 10 U. S. App. 339, 52 Fed. 371, declaring that, where the jury find difficulty in reaching a conclusion by any mathematical calculation, they may estimate the pecuniary loss from the death complained of by their own good sense and sound judgment.

Necessity of use of — in general.

While admissible it is not necessary to introduce in evidence life expectancy or mortality tables in order to entitle the plaintiff to recover substantial damages as compensation for the pecuniary loss by the death complained of. The jury may assess such damages as may fairly compensate for the pecuniary loss complained of, determining the life expectancy of the decedent or the statutory beneficiaries, as the circumstances of the case may require, from other evidence in the case, such as evidence as to health, habits, occupation, environment, etc., of the person whose life expectancy is the subject of inquiry.<sup>12</sup>

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

VILLAGE OF WEST SALEM

v.

INDUSTRIAL COMMISSION OF WISCONSIN et al.

(162 Wis. 57, 155 N. W. 929.)

Master and servant — workmen's compensation — basis for computation to one summoned to assist marshal.

The compensation for death of a plumber killed while responding to the call of the village marshal for aid in enforcing the criminal law must be based not on his earnings as a plumber, but on those of policemen under a statute providing that where specified methods for ascertaining the average earnings cannot be fairly and reasonably applied, then the average annual earnings for basis of compensation shall be fixed at the sum received by other employees of the same or most similar class engaged in the same or similar employment in the same or neighboring locality.

For other cases, see Master and Servant, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. 8.

ants appealing from the part holding that compensation was computed upon a wrong basis. Affirmed.

Statement by Siebecker, J.:

This is an action to set aside an award of the Industrial Commission requiring the plaintiff village to pay to Alice Voeck $3,000 on account of the death of her husband, William Voeck, caused by an accidental injury while in the employ of the plaintiff village. The circuit court set aside the award of the Industrial Commission and remanded the cause to the Commission for further proceedings. Both parties appeal from this judgment of the circuit court.

William Voeck was a resident of the village of West Salem at the time of his death. One William Jones had left the village to escape criminal prosecution. He returned in about a year. On or about May 2, 1914, a warrant, which had been previously issued by a justice of the peace and made returnable before the county court of La Crosse county, was put into the hands of the deputy sheriff, Weingarten, who attempted to take William Jones into custody. Mr. Wilcox, the village marshal of West Salem, met Jones and Weingarten immediately after Weingarten took Jones into custody, and was informed by Weingarten that Jones did not wish to go to the village lockup. Wilcox suggested that Jones might give bail for his appearance, and they applied to Justice Nelson for release of Jones on his bond; but the justice disclaimed any authority to release Jones from custody. The parties then applied to Justice Phillip, who also refused to take any steps to release Jones. Jones became angered at this refusal, and, drawing a gun, threatened Mr. Phillip. The deputy sheriff prevailed upon Jones not to shoot and to leave Justice Phillip's house but when Phillip closed the house door Jones made angry threats and broke the glass in the door and again threatened Phillip. Weingarten did not succeed in restraining Jones in this disturbance of the peace, whereupon Wilcox stated to Weingarten that they must do something and that he would get help, and started to get assistance. Wilcox met Voeck and told him that Jones had a gun and that Weingarten needed his help, and proceeded to call others to assist in suppressing Jones' disturbance and violation of the criminal law. When Voeck got within a few feet of Jones and Weingarten, Jones suddenly drew his revolver and shot Voeck, who died a short time thereafter.

Voeck was employed as a plumber in the village of West Salem and earned about $18 per week. The Industrial Commission based the award of $3,000 upon Voeck's earnings as a plumber. The circuit court, upon appeal, held the village to be liable under the Compensation Act, but held that the award as fixed by the Industrial Commission was erroneously based upon Voeck's average earnings as a plumber, and held that compensation must be based upon earnings in "the same or a similar" or the "most similar employment" to that in which the deceased was engaged at the time of the injury, namely, that of a policeman of the village, and remanded the cause to the Commission for further proceedings. From such judgment both of the parties appeal.

Messrs. Baldwin & Bosshard, for plaintiff:

In order to hold plaintiff liable, it must first be determined that Voeck was a policeman under an appointment or contract of hire in the service of the village, and was not an official.

Stebecker, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The inquiries are: Was the deceased, Voeck, at the time in question, assisting the village marshal in the execution of his duties in suppressing a disturbance of the peace, and aiding the marshal and the deputy sheriff, Weingarten, in arresting Jones for violating the law of the state? And was he, if so engaged, employed as a policeman of the village, within the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act?

The trial court correctly and clearly states the situation of affairs at the time Jones created the trouble at Justice Philip's home, which caused the village marshal to call on Voeck to assist him and Weingarten at this place. The circuit court concluded that "while Jones was technically under arrest by the deputy sheriff, it is apparent that he was not under the control of the deputy, and that the deputy sheriff did not have either the courage or the ability to perform his duty as a peace officer. After his arrest Jones was both disturbing the peace and violating the law, and the deputy sheriff did not prevent further continuance of such conduct. Under such circumstances, it was the duty of the marshal to take such action as would prevent further continuance of this lawless conduct on the part of Jones."

The facts and circumstances of the case show that Jones defied Weingarten and the marshal in their efforts to execute the law, and that an occasion was presented to the village marshal for calling upon citizens to aid them. It is clearly shown that the marshal called on Voeck for aid and that Voeck responded to the call and proceeded to the place where he was needed. While approaching Jones and Weingarten, Jones shot him.

The marshal's acts constituted in the law a command to Voeck to assist in the execution of the criminal law under the provision of § 884, Stat. 1913, and refusal to comply therewith would have subjected him to the penalties of § 4888, Stat. 1913. By command of the village marshal Voeck was required to perform duties of the same kind as those of the marshal; namely, police duties to suppress a breach of the peace and to enforce the criminal law. The transaction in fact conferred on Voeck the powers and duties of a police officer for the purposes and the exigencies of the occasion. From this it logically follows that Voeck was engaged with the marshal in performing police duties in the village at the marshal's command. The duties and powers thus imposed on him under authority of the village marshal, by force of the statutes, constituted an appointment of Voeck to perform police service for the village. State ex rel. Brown v. Appleby, 139 Wis. 195, 120 N. W. 861; McCumber v. Waukesha County, 91 Wis. 442, 65 N. W. 51; 3 Cyc. 877; 2 R. C. L. 491, § 52. The result is that Voeck acquired the status of a police officer of the village, and was engaged in the execution of the criminal law at the time of his death.

The Compensation Act provides (§ 2394—7) that the term "employee," as used in the act, shall be construed to mean: "(1) Every person in the service of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein under any appointment, or contract of hire, express or implied, oral or written, except any official of the state, or of any county, city, town, village, or school district therein. . . . Policemen and firemen shall be deemed employees within the meaning of subdivision 1" of this section, and any compensation awarded a policeman or fireman shall be reduced by any sum he received from any pension or benefit fund to which his municipality contributed.

It is considered that Voeck, as we have shown, was in fact rendering services under an authorized appointment of the village within the power conferred by statute upon the marshal; that he acted in the capacity of a temporary policeman for the village by authority of law, and that the deceased was performing policeman's service within the contemplation of the Workmen's Compensation Act.

The service which he was performing did not entitle him to any specified fee or remuneration, and hence it furnishes no wage basis upon which to compute compensation. The circuit court held that the Commission erred in basing their award on decedent's average wage as a plumber, which was his employment up to that time. We consider that the court properly held that decedent's employment as a plumber is not the correct basis of computation under § 2394—10, Stat. 1913, which provides that, where the specified methods for ascertaining the average annual earnings cannot reasonably and fairly be applied, then the average annual earnings for basis of compensation shall be fixed, in the light of decedent's previous earnings, at the sum received by other employees of the same or most similar class, engaged in the same or similar employment, in the same or neighboring locality. The decedent not having been employed nor earning a salary as policeman during the year preceding his death, the award must be based on the earning of one doing policeman's service in his or the neighboring locality, as provided by § 2394—10, Stat. 1913. The Circuit Court rendered a correct judgment and properly remanded the cause to the Industrial Commission for further proceedings according to law.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed. No costs are allowed to either party.

Annotation—Evidence of the earnings of the deceased to show pecuniary loss by his death.

This note is confined strictly to the consideration of the question of the earnings or earning capacity of the deceased as bearing upon the amount recoverable for his death. It is not concerned with questions affecting the amount of accumulations or contributions from that source, or the basis or method of fixing their equivalent.

For a reference to other notes passing upon different phases of the question as to the character and sufficiency of the evidence to show pecuniary loss to the estate of the deceased or his beneficiaries, see note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056.

Earnings or earning capacity as affecting damages recoverable—in general.

In assessing the damages to a beneficiary for the destruction of the life of a relative, one of the important matters to be considered as bearing upon the beneficiary's pecuniary loss is that of the earning capacity of the deceased.<sup>1</sup> Decedent's earning capacity, however, is not the criterion of the beneficiary's pecuniary loss, for it is only to the extent of contributions from the decedent's earnings and a reasonable expectation of future contributions therefrom that the beneficiary may be said to have suffered a pecuniary loss in so far as concerns the question of support or aid. Nor does evidence of the actual contributions by the deceased from his earnings in the past alone determine the beneficiary's pecuniary loss in this regard, for there is also to be taken into consideration the reasonable expectation of contributions in the future; and the amount of such contributions is to be determined not only from the earnings of the decedent at the time of his injury and death, but also in view of his increased or diminished earning capacity in the future.<sup>2</sup> It cannot be assumed

Betting v. Hobbett (1892) 142 Ill. 72, 30 N. E. 1048, affirming (1891) 42 Ill. App. L.R.A.1918C.

174, holding that in case of the death of the husband, the loss of the wife's means of support is coextensive with the duration of her life; and the general average of the husband's contributions can only be ascertained from proof of his wages and earnings which furnished her means of support.

The measure of damages recoverable in actions of this character is worked out that the earning capacity of a young man will remain stationary during his life; hence there is to be considered the question of a reasonable prospect of the decedent's promotion and consequent increase of wages.<sup>3</sup>

The question, however, as to what is to be taken as the basis to determine the earnings or the earning capacity of the deceased, may be controlled by statute. For example, where the statute in effect provides that, under designated circumstances, the basis for determining the earning capacity of the deceased shall be the average earnings of other persons pursuing similar employment in the same vicinity, in assessing the compensation to be made for the death of a plumber, killed while aiding the village marshal in making an arrest at the latter's request, the earnings of one doing police service in that locality are to control, and not the earning capacity of the deceased in his trade as a plumber.<sup>4</sup> quite in detail in Secord v. Schroeder Lumber Co. 160 Wis. 1, 150 N. W. 971, wherein the court, while conceding that "there is no standard by which they can be gaged, except the judgment of a jury, which may take a wide range and not be manifestly excessive by any rule which the court can lay down, there are some definite data to figure from: First, the average earning power of the deceased at the time of his death; second, his expectancy of life; third, his probable average earning power during such expectancy, considering his condition of health, what he had been accustomed to earn, and all the circumstances bearing on the question; fourth, the proportion of such earning capacity which, with reasonable certainty, would have reached the wife had he not been taken away; fifth, the present worth thereof; and sixth, the amount it would take to purchase an income during the expectancy of his life equal to the amount the dependents would probably have received out of his earnings."

Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Leslie (1915) 238 U. S. 599, 59 L. ed. 1478, 35 Sup. St. Rep. 844, holds that under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, the measure of damages to statutory beneficiaries is their actual pecuniary loss; and it is error to instruct the jury that it is the present worth of such sum as the evidence indicates to be a fair and just compensation with reference to the pecuniary loss, taking into consideration the age, health, habits, occupation, and expectation of life and mental and physical disposition of the deceased to labor, and the probable increase or diminution of that ability with lapse of time, and the decedent's earning power and rate of wages, deducting therefrom the personal expenses of the deceased.

<sup>3</sup> Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Minor (1907) 2 Ga. App. 804, 59 S. E. 81, holding that where there is no evidence of a definite, reasonable, or certain prospect of increase of earnings, but there is evidence as to the age, health, and habits, etc., of the deceased from which the jury may reasonably infer an increase of capacity, the jury should not be authorized to consider decedent's prospect of increase of earnings, but they may properly consider the probabilities of increased earning capacity.

that, in estimating the damages resulting to a widow from the death of her husband, an active business man, sixty-one years old and enjoying excellent health, the jury are not bound by the amount the decedent actually earned during his life, but may consider whether his earning capacity would have probably increased or diminished with increasing age.

International & G. N. R. Co. v. Ormond (1935) 64 Tex. 485, holding that the amount the decedent was earning at the time of his death forms no standard by which to estimate the damages for his death, for the additional experience and skill which he may substantially acquire may increase his wages; hence there is an element of uncertainty in fixing any mathematical standard.

And see Southern Railway-Carolina Div. v. Bennett (1914) 233 U. S. 80, 58 L. ed. 860, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 566, 10 N. C. O. A. 853, affirming in (1913) 98 S. C. 42, 79 S. E. 710, holding that the jury are not confined in their award of damages under the Federal Employers' Liability Act to the wages being earned by the deceased at the time of his death, and the amount which would produce such income for the life expectancy of the deceased.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. John (1895) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 342, 29 S. W. 558, holding that the reasonable prospect of the promotion of the deceased and the consequent increase of his wages are properly to be considered in assessing the damages for his death.

Chicago, St. L. & N. O. R. Co. v. Benedict (1913) 154 Ky. 675, 159 S. W. 526, holding that the court cannot assume that a young man's earning power will always remain the same; hence, calculations based on his earning capacity at the time of his death are not conclusive, for his earning capacity may increase, and frequently does.

Central Foundry Co. v. Bennett (1905) 144 Ala. 184, 1 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1150, 113 Am. St. Rep. 32, 39 So. 574, holding that where the decedent was a bright, economical, and industrious person, the jury, in assessing damages for his death, may take into consideration his probable increased earning capacity.

—where earnings of the deceased would not benefit estate or beneficiary.

Where the earnings of the decedent would not benefit the decedent's estate or his statutory beneficiaries they are not to be taken into consideration in assessing the damages for the negligent destruction of his life. For example, where the recovery for the death of a child is his probable value to his estate had he lived out his life expectancy the earnings of the child, during minority are not to be included in estimating the damages, if such earnings belong to the parents.<sup>5</sup> So, where damages are assessed to cover the pecuniary loss to children by the death of the mother, her earnings are not to be considered, since they belong to the husband.<sup>6</sup>

Character of evidence—earnings or earning capacity at the time of the injury.

As pointed out in another note in this series,<sup>7</sup> there is a conflict of judicial opinion with regard to the admissibility of evidence relative to the profits derived by a deceased from a business in which he was engaged at the time of his injury and death, as bearing upon his earning capacity. This conflict, however, does not exist with reference to the admissibility of evidence as to the wages received or the earnings of the deceased in the profession or trade he was following; the distinction frequently made between the two classes of cases being that the evidence is not admissible in the first class of cases if the capital invested in the business represents the larger basis of income, the personal services of the deceased being only subsidiary. Of course, as to salary or wages this question cannot arise.

Since the earnings of the deceased and his earning capacity are to be taken into consideration in assessing the damages for the negligent destruction of his life, it follows that these matters are to be proved by the plaintiff, and he is entitled to introduce any competent evidence having a material bearing thereon, including evidence as to the actual earnings or the earning capacity of the deceased at about the time he was injured.<sup>8</sup> And it is not necessary in this regard to produce direct evidence as to the decedent's earnings, but indirect evidence may be sufficient.<sup>9</sup> For example, the earnings or earning capacity of the deceased may be established by evidence of the scale of wages paid persons working in an occupation similar to that pursued by the deceased at the time of his death.<sup>10</sup> And as affecting the decedent's earning capacity, evidence is admissible as to his physical condition and his ability to pursue his ordinary vocation.<sup>11</sup> If there are any extraordinary circumstances existing tending to show that the amount of wages decedent was receiving at the time of his death is not a proper criterion as to his future earnings, defendant is entitled to show the facts.<sup>12</sup>

—earnings for some time prior to injury.

It has been held that where the inquiry as to the decedent's earnings is not confined to any particular time, evidence relative thereto is immaterial;<sup>13</sup> and evidence is inadmissible as to the earnings of a married woman prior to her marriage, some years before her injury and death;<sup>14</sup> and it has been held that evidence as to the amount the deceased was earning at the time he was killed is admissible, but not as to the amount he was earning a year prior thereto.<sup>15</sup> Generally, however, evidence is admissible as to the earnings of the deceased for a considerable period of time prior to his death.<sup>16</sup> For example, evidence is admissible as to wages received by the deceased when last employed,<sup>17</sup> and decedent's earning capacity may be shown from the time of his death back to his young manhood, including his earnings in a partnership some years before.<sup>18</sup>

Evidence as to trades never followed by the deceased.

It has been held that, as bearing upon the earning capacity of a child, evidence is admissible as to the occupation followed by the parent, and as to the wages received by him.<sup>22</sup> This evidence was admitted on the ground that there was some likelihood that the child would have followed the occupation of the parent had it survived the injury, the weight to be attached to the evidence being for the jury. But evidence is not admissible as to the earnings of persons following a certain trade as bearing upon the earning capacity in the future of an apprentice to such trade, had he continued to live.<sup>23</sup>

Evidence relative to value of deceased's services in the future.

Since it involves the opinion of the witness and is remote and contingent, evidence is inadmissible as to what the deceased's services would be worth when he should have reached majority, had he lived, although the measure of recovery is the value of the life lost.<sup>24</sup> But where Christian v. Columbus & R. R. Co. (1892) 90 Ga. 124, 15 S. E. 701, holding that where a decedent had engaged in different occupations during his life, evidence is admissible as to what he made or was capable of making in each.

was proper to show what he earned as engineer together with evidence as to his habits of industry and ability, and upon this point it is competent for the defendant to show that the deceased was not competent to fill the position of engineer.

It is, however, pointed out that the verdict indicates that the jury did not allow the total earnings which, as a school-teacher, the little girl would have received for the period of her expectancy of life, or even the total net earnings, and it is further pointed out that it is not claimed that the damages awarded ($1,210) were excessive.

W. 758, holding, where the same question arose as to evidence of this character in an action to recover for the death of a girl eight years old, whose stepfather was a school-teacher, that the evidence was competent to go to the jury for what it was worth, since there was some likelihood of the child's following the vocation of her stepfather.

the deceased was actually engaged for future service, evidence is admissible of what he would earn therein, based upon his earnings in a previous service of a similar character.<sup>25</sup> And it has been held that evidence is admissible as to the ability and capacity of the decedent to earn money generally, and it need not be confined to the occupation followed by him at the time of his death, although, as bearing upon his earning capacity, evidence of the salary actually received by him at this time is also admissible.<sup>26</sup> The opinion of witnesses as to what the deceased could earn in an occupation he was not pursuing and which he never pursued is inadmissible.<sup>27</sup>

Evidence as to chances of promotion.

It has been held that evidence is admissible as to the chances the deceased had for promotion in the line of work or trade he was pursuing at the time he was killed.<sup>28</sup> The general rule, however, is that evidence as to the chances for the promotion of the deceased depends very largely upon the showing as to the existence of a reasonable likelihood thereof had he survived the injury; if shown to have existed, evidence in regard thereto is admissible,<sup>29</sup> but not where the chances for promotion are merely conjectural or are dependent upon the deceased having qualifications he is not shown to have possessed.<sup>30</sup> And evidence is inadmissible with regard to the chance the decedent had for a promotion of which he had no definite assurance.<sup>31</sup> Nor is evidence admissible as to the mere possibility of the promotion of the deceased.<sup>32</sup>

At the best, evidence of this character is difficult, problematical, and uncertain as a basis of damages, for there are always possibilities of promotion and advancement for every person, and whether any given person will reap the harvest depends on his personal qualities, his industry, zeal, and the duration of his life. It is impossible, in the nature of things, for proof to be introduced which will cover the various elements in the problem.<sup>33</sup>

v.

ERIE RAILROAD COMPANY, Appt.

(219 N. Y. 533, 114 N. E. 1049.)

Evidence — wrongful death — profits of business.

1. Evidence of the profits of the business in which decedent was engaged is not admissible upon the question of the damages to be allowed for wrongful death.

For other cases, see Evidence, XI. g, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — earnings from investments.

2. Permitting the widow to state the amount contributed by her husband, who conducted a small express business, to her support before his death, as bearing upon the damages to be awarded for such death, does not violate the rule that proof of the profits of a business is not admissible upon such question, where his income was due chiefly to his own efforts, his investment being in horses and wagons used by himself, with the occasional assistance of other drivers.

Willard Bartlett, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question which we deem it necessary to discuss in disposing of this appeal relates to the admission of certain evidence introduced to show the pecuniary injuries resulting from the decedent's death to the person or persons for whose benefit the action was brought. Code Civ. Proc. § 1904.

After having testified that she received money from her husband, the widow was asked what she received and how much. The question was objected to as irrelevant and immaterial, counsel adding to his objection the statement that the decedent was in business for himself, and that the estate was still carrying on the business. The court responded: "The estate, as you call it, could go on in business whether he was living or dead—the same people might—I overrule the objection,"—and counsel for the defendant duly excepted. The witness answered that her husband gave her all the money he made, $35 a week when they were in business.

By previous and subsequent testimony of the same witness, all taken without objection or exception, it appeared that the decedent had carried on an express business between Hackensack and New York with wagons and horses driven by himself and sometimes by a driver whom he employed. At first he gave his wife $25 a week, and later she got more, as the business increased. She could not keep it up after his death, as the expenses were too high, and she seems to have abandoned it altogether about eighteen months after he was killed.

Counsel for the appellant invokes the rule that evidence of profits of business which are uncertain and fluctuating in character and amount is not admissible to prove loss sustained by reason of personal injuries (Walsh v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 204 N. Y. 58, 68, 37 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1137, 97 N. E. 408), and asks us to reverse the judgment for the violation of this rule. Individually I doubt whether the point was distinctly presented to the mind of the trial judge, but as a majority of the court think otherwise we must pass upon it.

The first question is whether the rule applies to death cases as well as to cases of personal injury not resulting in death. It has been held that it does in Pennsylvania (McCracken v. Consolidated Traction Co. 201 Pa. 384, 50 Atl. 832); and in Read v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. 32 App. Div. 503, 53 N. Y. Supp. 209, a death case decided by the appellate division in the second department, when Chief Judge Cullen and I were members of that court, one of the grounds for reversing the judgment was the erroneous admission of proof of the profits realized by the plaintiff's intestate as member of a partnership which was engaged in performing contracts with the city of Brooklyn for cleaning out sewers. The reasons for the rule excluding proof of profits are just as cogent in a death case as in an action for personal injuries not resulting in death, and we think it applies to both classes of actions alike.

But was the rule really violated in the case at bar? I think not. Not a word was said about profits, in questioning the widow or in her responses. After she had stated that her husband was in the express business, she was asked how much money she received from him. I have found no New York case in which such a question has been held to be objectionable. The amount customarily received by a wife from her deceased husband plainly has some bearing on the question what constitutes a fair and just compensation for the pecuniary injuries resulting from the decedent's death to the person or persons for whom the action is brought, the wife being one of those persons. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1903, 1904. The widow's description of her husband's express business shows that it was really an individual enterprise conducted chiefly by himself, with the occasional assistance of other drivers, in which the horses and wagons corresponded to a mechanic's tools of trade. There is a manifest difference between an individual express business such as this was and the business carried on by a great express company. While the decedent's income was, to some extent, derived from the amount he had invested in his horses and wagons, his earnings were chiefly personal, as is apparent from the fact that there ceased to be any net income from the business after his death. The case falls within the doctrine of Kronold v. New York, 186 N. Y. 40, 78 N. E. 572, 20 Am. Neg. Rep. 600, where the element of personal earnings was held to predominate over a comparatively small and incidental investment of capital.

On the whole we conclude that no error was committed by the learned trial judge in the ruling which has been considered, and therefore that the judgment should be affirmed, with costs.

Annotation—Admissibility, in action for wrongful death, of evidence of profits or contributions from business conducted by decedent.

For other notes in this series as to the admissibility, character, or sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss from the negligent killing of a person, see the note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056, where the different notes presenting different aspects of this matter are referred to at length.

Where labor of the deceased formed major part of investment.

At page 36 of the note in 52 L.R.A. on the general subject of damages for tort as affected by loss of profits, it is pointed out that the loss of earnings and of earning power from personal injury are elements of damage, and evidence of the loss of profits which depend upon the personal exertions of the person injured, as distinguished from those which depend upon the investment of capital, may be given in evidence, in an action for personal injuries, not as a rule of damages, but as tending to establish the extent of the injured person's wealth, earnings, or earning power. And at page 38, the doctrine is asserted that the character and extent of the business of a person injured, to which he devoted his personal attention, and the profits therefrom, may be given in evidence in an action to recover damages for personal injury preventing him from transacting his ordinary business, as tending to establish the extent of his loss of earnings or earning power. SPREEN v. ERIE R. Co. ante, 1086, holds that the rule applicable to the admissibility of evidence of business profits in actions for personal injuries also applies to actions for the negligent killing of a person engaged in business, and recognizes that such evidence is not admissible where the profits arise from the capital invested in the business rather than from the labor and services of the decedent. It is, however, asserted that this rule does not preclude the plaintiff from showing, in an action to recover compensation for the negligent killing of her intestate, the amount of money which the decedent was in the habit of contributing to the support and maintenance of his family, although these contributions came from the profits of his business. In this case, however, the court also pointed out that the business in which the decedent was engaged was an express business, and the profits therefrom, from which these contributions were made, were very largely due to his personal services and labor.

Admission of evidence of profits from a business in which the capital invested was the major source of income was denied in McCracken v. Consolidated Traction Co. (1902) 201 Pa. 384, 50 Atl. 832, holding that evidence to show the profits of the deceased in a partnership business, and the amount of money that he furnished his family, was not admissible as bearing upon the amount of damage they sustained by his death.

And see also Read v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1898) 32 App. Div. 503, 53 N. Y. Supp. 209, holding that evidence of the decedent's profits from a temporary partnership of which he was a member, and which was engaged in performing public contracts secured under competitive bidding, involving the use of capital and property by the decedent, is too speculative, and hence is inadmissible.

And see Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Gunderson (1898) 174 Ill. 495, 51 N. E. 708, holding that, in an action for the wrongful death of a cheese maker, evidence as to the condition of the cheese making business is not admissible.

The following cases, however, apparently hold that in actions of this character evidence of the profits made by the deceased from the business he was conducting at the time of his injury and death is admissible as bearing upon the earning capacity of the deceased and the pecuniary loss to the statutory beneficiaries:

—Schneider v. Chicago R. Co. (1913) 177 Ill. App. 334, holding that, where the wife of the decedent was associated with him in his business and knew the amount of his earnings, and his books of account cannot be found, her testimony as to the amount of his earnings is admissible;

—Walters v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1875) 41 Iowa, 71, holding to be admissible evidence as to the ownership of a mill by the father of a two-year-old child, and as to the profits received by him therefrom as bearing upon the damages to the estate of the child, on the theory that the child might follow the occupation of the father;

—Shaber v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1881) 28 Minn. 103, 9 N. W. 575, holding that evidence is admissible as to the decedent's business ability and success and the amount of property he had acquired up to the time of his death, for the purpose of showing the pecuniary loss to his widow and children by his death;

—Witte v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. (1916) 171 N. C. 909, 88 S. E. 435, holding that, as bearing upon the earning capacity of the deceased, evidence is admissible that he went into business about two years before receiving the injury from which he died having a certain sum of money, and when his estate was wound up he had a much larger amount. and the fact that the evidence was based upon the decedent's bank book and statements by the decedent and his wife and mother does not render the evidence incompetent where these other matters were brought out on cross-examination.

And see Meyer v. Hart (1897) 23 App. Div. 131, 48 N. Y. Supp. 904, holding that evidence is admissible as to the earnings and probable profits of the deceased from his business; Tilley v. Hud- son, River R. Co. (1864) 29 N. Y. 252, 86 Am. Dec. 287, holding that evidence is admissible as to the capacity of the decedent to conduct business and make money.

In Blake v. Midland R. Co. (1852) 18 Q. B. 93, 118 Eng. Reprint, 35, 16 Jur. 562, 21 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 233, for the purpose of aiding in the assessment of damages, evidence was given by the plaintiff of the average income of the deceased from the profits of a mercantile business carried on by the firm to which he belonged, and of the value of a house and furniture which belonged to him, it appearing that the plaintiff married deceased without any fortune and there had been a child by the marriage, which had died. And evidence was given by the defendant of the terms upon which the plaintiff and deceased lived together.

It has been held that, where the deceased, a married woman with a family, carried on a certain shirt and bosom business, evidence is admissible as to the manner in which she carried on the business and the extent thereof, as bearing upon the pecuniary loss to her husband and children by her death. Meyer v. Hart (N. Y.) supra, holding that evidence of the amount of work, earnings, and probable profits of the deceased, a married woman, is competent in an action to recover for her wrongful death in behalf of her husband, where there are no next of kin surviving; in such case the husband being by statute entitled to the entire personal estate of his deceased wife; Austin v. Metropolitan Street R. Co. (1905) 108 App. Div. 249, 95 N. Y. Supp. 740, holding, where the husband was the sole statutory beneficiary of the damages recoverable for the death of his wife, that, if there is evidence that the wife was engaged in business in her individual behalf and also evidence as to the amount that she was making therefrom and as to her health and age, it is error to instruct the jury to award only nominal damages, although the husband was living apart from his wife at the time of her injury and death, since, there being no children, upon her death he would under the statute succeed to her personal estate.

It is clear that, where the profits from the business arise from or are created by the personal efforts and labor of the decedent, evidence thereof is admissible in actions of this character:

—Diller v. Northern California Power L.R.A. 1918C.

Co. (1912) 162 Cal. 531, 123 Pac. 359, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 908, holding that evidence is admissible as to the amount the deceased earned in his business as real estate dealer;

—Evarts v. Santa Barbara Consol. R. Co. (1906) 3 Cal. App. 712, 86 Pac. 830, holding that evidence is admissible that the deceased was a practising physician having patients at the time he was killed, as bearing upon his earning capacity;

—Christian v. Columbus & R. R. Co. (1892) 90 Ga. 124, 15 S. E. 701, holding that, where the decedent was filling a public office for a definite term of years, the amount of his income therefrom is admissible only to the extent of showing the pecuniary loss from the unexpired term, and not to furnish a basis for the direct computation for a longer period;

—Boyce v. New York City R. Co. (1908) 126 App. Div. 248, 110 N. Y. Supp. 393, holding that evidence is admissible as to the amount the deceased received as salary, and also as to his income from a position in connection with a corporation, where his interest in the capital stock of this corporation was received in payment of services rendered the corporation;

—Wheeling & L. E. R. Co. v. Parker (1906) 29 Ohio C. C. 1, holding that evidence of the value of decedent's business as a fire insurance agent is admissible as bearing upon his earning capacity when living, and evidence is also admissible as to his personal characteristics in relation to people whom he met in business, but evidence is not admissible that his property is mortgaged;

—Bogges v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1912) 234 Pa. 379, 83 Atl. 356, holding that evidence is admissible as to the salary of the deceased as the manager of a firm, or as to his profits from a business requiring but little capital; in such case evidence is also admissible as to the monthly allowance he gave his wife.

In Memphis Consol. Gas & E. Co. v. Letsor (1905) 68 C. C. A. 453, 135 Fed. 969, writ of certiorari denied in (1905) 197 U. S. 623, 49 L. ed. 911, 25 Sup. Ct. Rep. 800, an action to recover pecuniary loss to widow and children by the death of the husband and father, a contractor, evidence of his contributions to the family was held proper as bearing upon his earning capacity, no witness being able to testify definitely as to decedent's income from his business.

Evidence as to income from farm.

In some jurisdictions it is held that, where the deceased was a farmer, evidence is admissible as to the amount of crops he raised, or the profits he made from his business, and his accumulations therefrom, for the purpose of showing the pecuniary loss to his statutory beneficiaries by his death:

—Memphis Consol. Gas. & E. Co. v. Letsor (Fed.) supra, holding that evidence of what the decedent earned upon his farm is admissible as bearing upon his earning capacity;

—Wrightsville & T. R. Co. v. Gornto (1907) 129 Ga. 204, 58 S. E. 769, holding that evidence is admissible as to the occupation of deceased and the amount of money he usually made each year as a farmer, as bearing upon his earning capacity;

—International & G. N. R. Co. v. Kuehn (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 210, 21 S. W. 58, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 602, holding that evidence is admissible as to the amount of crops the decedent could raise in a year and the amount of money he could earn;

—Sebille v. Dunn (1917) — R. I. —, 99 Atl. 831, holding that evidence as to the crops raised by the deceased and his income therefrom, his personal expenses, and expenses of maintaining the farm, is admissible;

—Ryan v. Oshkosh Gaslight Co. (1909) 138 Wis. 466, 120 N. W. 264, holding that evidence is admissible as to the profits made by the deceased in business as a truck farmer, and upon this point evidence is admissible as to the number of acres he cultivated, the crops he raised, and the profits therefrom.

In recognizing and applying this rule it has been held that where, from the very nature of things, it is impossible to determine with accuracy the income and expenses of the deceased, a lack of accurate figures will not preclude the recovery of substantial damages, if the testimony furnishes sufficient material from which a reasonably fair computation can be made. Sebille v. Dunn (R. I.) supra. In this case deceased was a farmer and kept no books or memoranda which would furnish any assistance in arriving at either his gross or net income.

In other jurisdictions, however, evidence of the profits made by the deceased in his business of farming or truck gardening, or the amount of crops he raised in previous years, has been held inadmissible as being too speculative:

—Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Howard (1891) 90 Tenn. 144, 19 S. W. 116, holding that it is competent to show the ability and capacity for labor of the deceased, as well as his skill in any particular art or profession, in order to show what he was capable of earning, but that evidence is inadmissible as to the minimum value of his crops for different years, for such evidence is mere speculation, since the next year or years might not be so abundant or favorable;

—Hewlett v. Brooklyn Heights R. Co. (1901) 63 App. Div. 423, 71 N. Y. Supp. 531, holding that, where the decedent was a market gardener, evidence is not admissible, as bearing upon his income, as to the quantity of garden truck he sold each week or the amount received from it, since this income involved the use of capital as well as labor.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Manistee County to review a judgment in plaintiff's favor for an inadequate amount, and denying a motion for new trial, in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's decedent. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas Smurthwaite, for plaintiff in error:

Witnesses may be called to testify to the financial benefit of the child to its parents.

Cooper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 86 Mich. 261, 11 Am. St. Rep. 482, 33 N. W. 306; Rajnowski v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 74 Mich. 27, 41 N. W. 847; Hurst v. Detroit City R. Co. 146 Mich. 568, 109 N. W. 1052.

Messrs. P. T. Glassmire and Max E. Neal, for defendant in error:

The proofs should contain some evidence of a pecuniary loss before recovery can be had.

Love v. Detroit, J. & C. R. Co. 170 Mich. 1, 135 N. W. 963.

A witness must, to some extent at least, qualify herself touching the question of damages; mere guesswork will not suffice; a defendant requires some protection from mere conjecture.

The damages are necessarily confined and expressly limited to the pecuniary loss sustained.

Charlebois v. Gogebic & M. River R. Co. 91 Mich. 59, 51 N. W. 812.

Stone, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action on the case brought under the Death Act (3 Comp. Laws 1897, §§ 10,427, 10,428), to recover damages by reason of an injury resulting in the death of plaintiff's decedent. At the time of the injury complained of, the defendant owned and operated an electric street railway line L.R.A.1918C.

in and through the city of Manistee. It was laid upon Eighth street, two blocks from Kosciusko street on the west, to Vine street on the east. Englemann street crosses Eighth street one block east of Kosciusko street, in a well-settled neighborhood where there were many people, including children, passing. The closed cars used by the defendant at that time were known as "pay as you enter" cars, and one man performed the duties of conductor and motorman. The plaintiff, with his wife and two children, — a boy about seven years old, and Rosalia, a girl aged five years and three months, — resided on the east side of Englemann street about 200 feet north of Eighth street. He owned a house and lot there. Plaintiff was a laboring man, and had steady employment only a part of the time. In September, 1914, the child Rosalia began going to school, attending the kindergarten department, located south and west of the home. The usual course traveled by the little girl in going to school was south from the home, crossing the street railway track to the south side of Eighth street, then west one block to Kosciusko street, and thence south one block to the schoolhouse. She usually returned by the same route. Her school hours consisted of the forenoon session only. On October 28, 1914, Rosalia went to school at the usual hour and remained during the session, was released at about 11 o'clock, and started for home. One witness who saw her said she was "tripping" along on the sidewalk on the south side of Eighth street. She arrived at the corner of Englemann and Eighth streets, and took a diagonal course from the southwest to the northeast corner. While crossing the track she was overtaken and struck by one of the defendant's eastbound cars, described as above, and was instantly killed. It was a bright, clear day, and there were no objects to prevent a clear view of the situation. The declaration alleged numerous acts of negligence, among them being that defendant failed and neglected to operate its car slowly, and failed and neglected to have its car under proper control, and failed to keep and maintain a diligent outlook for the safety of persons upon said street crossing, and also failed and neglected to use quick stopping devices, and to ring gongs, bells, or other known signals when approaching the said crossing.

The evidence varied as to the speed of the car; the motorman swearing that he was not running to exceed 10 or 12 miles an hour, while another witness testified as follows: "In my judgment that car which struck this child was traveling at that time at 20 miles an hour, anyway; that would be my best judgment."

We shall not state in detail the evidence relating to the claimed negligence of the defendant, for the reason that the question was submitted to the jury, and they found a verdict for the plaintiff, and the defendant has not appealed.

(1) It is sufficient to say that an examination of the record satisfies us that the question of negligence was one for the jury; and, they having found for the plaintiff, he cannot be heard to complain of the charge upon that branch of the case, the error, if any, being harmless.

Upon the trial of the case it appeared that Rosalia was an active girl, in good physical condition; that the plaintiff was thirty-nine years old; that his father and mother were both living; that the former was seventy-seven and the latter sixty-five years of age; and that the expenses of the child's funeral and burial were $71, not including the cemetery lot.

The mother of the child, Josephine Sceba, was sworn on behalf of the plaintiff.

The following is her testimony, and the rulings of the trial court relating to it:

I am the wife of Joseph Sceba and the mother of Rosa Sceba. I am twenty-eight years old. My father and mother are both living. They live out in the country. My father is sixty-four years of age and my mother is fifty-nine. They are in good health. My health is fine. At the time of her death Rosa was five years, two months, and about eighteen days old. She was born on the 10th day of August, in the year of 1909. Up to the time of her death she had good health.

Q. And what was her disposition as to being kindly, tractable, and obedient?

Counsel for defendant: We object to that as immaterial and incompetent, and the manner in which the question was asked.

Court: The objection is sustained.

Counsel for plaintiff: Note an exception.

Counsel for plaintiff: I didn't get the ground of the objection or the ruling?

Court: Well, it simply goes to the measure of damages, and that is what you are after.

Counsel for plaintiff: Yes.

Court: And that has no tendency to prove damages or disprove it. It is liable to be prejudiced on that subject.

Counsel for plaintiff: Well, I will want to ask her some more questions on that line, and I will say to you that in several cases it is held to be competent.

Court: I think, if you will examine that case you will find the questions were put in a different aspect.

Counsel for plaintiff: If it is the form of my question, I would be glad to change that for you.

Court: You can prove the usefulness of this girl.

Counsel for plaintiff: That is what I want to do.

Court: Proceed and do it. It has no tendency to do it the way you put it.

Q. State whether or not, Mrs. Sceba, this child was of a helpful nature.

A. Yes, sir. She was willing to do anything she could do, or help me in any way she could. She was good, and willing to work, and she was always coaxing me to do something, and she would always kiss me after I should tell her to do something, and I always put her at something she could do. That is, quite a bit she could do that I would not have to do.

Q. What, if any, work did you do, other than your housework, to help in supporting the family?

A. Well, in summer I had a garden to take care of, and housework, and in the winter I did sewing and the housework. I had all I wanted to do. It kept me going. Before I was married, my work was farm work. Since I was married, I have had a garden on our own lot. We raised all the vegetables that were used in the house. I raised practically all the vegetables the family needed. Rosa helped me. She would water the cabbage and tomato plants. She would help me weed. She would water the chickens and feed them and gather the eggs. It helped me quite a good deal. I could be at something else, busy, and tell her what she could do. I could depend on her. She was skilful. I made the clothes for myself and children. We had quite a few fruit trees on the lot, and she picked the fruit.

Q. In the manner you have stated, Mrs. Sceba, how would the benefits derived from her work and earnings, done by Rosa for you, compare with the cost of her maintenance?

Counsel for defendant: We object to that as immaterial and incompetent, as the record now stands.

Court: I am inclined to think it is incompetent.

Counsel for plaintiff: Think it is what!

Court: Incompetent. There is no proof that the lady has ever brought up any other children, or had any experience in that line.

Counsel for plaintiff: I did not hear.

Court: There is no proof this lady ever brought up and reared any other child, and no proof along that line, and no proof of experience or knowledge on her part, and you are calling for a conclusion.

Counsel for plaintiff: On her personal knowledge, she knows what it cost to maintain the child.

Court: There is no proof she had any knowledge what it cost to maintain the child, or what it would cost.

Q. I will ask that question.

Q. Do you know, Mrs. Sceba, about what it would cost to feed and clothe the child outside of your vegetables?

Counsel for defendant: I also object to that for the reason it is incompetent.

Court: The objection is sustained. It was all right until you spoiled it.

Q. You have no knowledge of about what it would cost to feed and clothe your daughter?

A. Of course she could just now about earn her living while she was growing better and healthier, or I mean stronger, with her work that she helped me. I never kept track of what it cost to clothe her. It did not cost very much, because I made all her clothes myself and her hats and bonnets,—all except her shoes. Her shoes were about all we had to buy for her.

Q. I will ask you now, how the cost of materials, that you purchased for her food and clothing, would compare with what benefits you derived from her little efforts to help you out?

Counsel for defendant: We object to that as incompetent the way the record stands.

Court: I will sustain the objection, for the reason she has already answered the question, and I am doubtful whether it is competent or not. She has already said it was about even.

Counsel for defendant: I move to have that answer stricken out, if she answered it.

Counsel for plaintiff: I think it is fairly competent.

Court: I will let it stand for the time being, but it is pretty close to the line.

Q. Now, Mrs. Sceba, with your knowledge of the disposition of Rosa, you can state whether or not her efforts in that behalf, and the benefits that were derived from her services, would increase or diminish?

Counsel for defendant: I object to that as incompetent.

Court: The objection is sustained. I think it is a question for the jury.

Counsel for plaintiff: Give me an exception.

A. Rosa was of medium size for her age. I did not work out for other people at any other work except sewing.

Q. State whether or not you have had opportunity to work out to any greater extent as this child grew older?

Counsel for defendant: We object to that as incompetent and immaterial.

Court: I think so. It calls for a con-L.R.A.1918C.

elusion based upon the future, of which she could have no knowledge, from the evidence already in, and which may hereafter be put in the case. In other words, I think to admit that line of proof would be an invasion of the province of the jury.

Counsel for plaintiff: There are two classes of cases in Michigan on that subject. . . . (Here followed a discussion of the Michigan cases herein referred to.)

Court: I am trying to rule right along the other case you are talking about.

Counsel for plaintiff: If your Honor is aware of the case, I have nothing further to say.

Court: I don't think there is anything in that case that would admit the proof I have ruled out.

Counsel for plaintiff: Under the prior case it was.

Court: I do not know any case it was.

Counsel for plaintiff: I think they have got that pretty well down to solid rock, when they state the jury was as good a judge as the parents or anybody else. That is all of this witness. You may cross-examine.

Cross-examination: "Our little girl first began going to school the beginning of September, 1914. She was in the kindergarten. Miss Lorenz was her teacher.

Court: I think, in order to make this record safe, I will strike from the record the testimony of this witness of what the child earned and expenses of maintenance, as about equal. That is the substance or gist of what she said. I will strike it out. It calls for a conclusion, and it calls for simply the sentiment of this mother as to the value of the services of this little girl. There is nothing to base it upon. She has given her testimony, and she has nothing upon which she can make that assertion. It is for the jury to say, and not for her to say. It can be stricken out.

Counsel for plaintiff: Note an exception.

The case was submitted to the jury, and the trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff in the sum of $71.

In the course of its charge to the jury the court instructed them that if they found for the plaintiff, and found that the services of the child during her minority would have exceeded the cost of her maintenance, then the father was entitled to recover that amount, whatever they found it to be; that in passing upon that question they should take into consideration the probabilities of the life of the child and the probabilities of the lives of the parents; and the attention of the jury was called to the length of the lives of the grandparents, and of the father and mother of the child, and of the state of health of the grandparents and of the father and mother, and of the state of health of the child at the time of her death. The court said:

"All these things you are to take into consideration in passing upon this subject. If you find for the plaintiff, if he is entitled to recover anything, he shall recover the cost of the burial of the child, the amount of which has been testified in the evidence and is uncontradicted,—$71. . . .

"The law says that you are to give fair and just compensation to these parents and this father, the plaintiff in the case, if you find for the plaintiff, in regard to his pecuniary loss, and nothing else at all.

"Counsel has made some figures in your presence. They are not controlling upon you, and they were permitted simply as a part of his argument, and the deductions he makes, or seeks to make, from the proofs in this case. It is your province to say finally what has been proved in the case, and what the damages are, if there are any over and above the $71.

"So, I say to you finally and briefly that if you find the defendant's negligence has been established, on any of these declared heads, in the manner I have suggested, your verdict will be for the plaintiff. . . .

"If you find for the plaintiff, he is entitled to receive at least $71, the cost of the burial of the little girl. If you find he has suffered a pecuniary loss because of her premature and early death, then he is entitled, in addition to the $71, to whatever you may fairly and justly find on that head, taking into consideration all the evidence in the case."

There was a motion for a new trial, based upon the grounds, among others, that the verdict was wholly inconsistent, unjust, and contrary to law, and that the damages awarded were wholly inadequate.

In his reasons for the denial of the motion for a new trial, the circuit judge, among other things, said: "It is true that a verdict like this shocks the sense of mankind, but that is because we have a sympathy which the law absolutely prohibits the jury from indulging in, or the court either. In my opinion, the law should permit damages for grief and sorrow, and then there would be damages of a substantial and tangible kind. My understanding is, the lawmakers refuse to indulge that, because it has been said by some writers that that would put a premium on the death of the child and jeopardize its life in very many cases; and that is probably true; nevertheless, so long as the law is as it is, and makes it purely and solely a question of pecuniary loss or profits, I think the verdict is right. I think that is the L.R.A.1918C.

view the jury took of it. I made that plain to them, or tried to, that they could not indulge in either sympathy or prejudice, and that it was simply a matter of dollars and cents. There were men on that jury who know, I am sure, that to rear a girl from the cradle to her legal majority is an expensive proposition. Of course, it is not as expensive among the laboring classes, but there were members of that class on the jury, and they know. And the peculiar thing about it is that the latest decisions on that subject leave the whole question of damages or lack of it to the judgment of the jury, regardless of the proof. To my mind, that is a perversion of every principle of the law; but if it is the law, and is to obtain as the law, then this court has no right to enter the jury box and say that they are mistaken in their judgment, because it is their judgment and nothing else, and it is based upon nothing. There wasn't a word of proof in the case as to what it cost to maintain this child, or any other child, or what it could earn, or what any other child could earn. There was some proof—a little—as to what the child did. And I say, if that is the law, then I have no right to meddle with this verdict at all, on this ground."

A judgment was entered in accordance with the verdict, and the plaintiff has brought the case here upon a writ of error, and there are twenty-nine assignments of error. Many of these relate to the question of negligence, and, for the reason already stated, will not be considered by us. The assignments of error relating to the question of damages were:

(2) That the court erred in sustaining the objection of counsel for defendant to the following question put to Josephine Sceba on direct examination: "What was her disposition as to being kindly, tractable, and obedient?"

(3) Also, in sustaining the objection of counsel for defendant to the following question asked Josephine Sceba: "Q. I will ask you now how the cost of materials that you purchased for the food and clothing will compare with the benefits you derived from her little efforts to help you?"

(4) Also, in sustaining the objection to the following question: "Q. Now, Mrs. Sceba, with your knowledge of the disposition of Rosa, you can state whether or not her efforts in that behalf, and the benefits that were derived from her services, would increase or diminish?"

(5) Also, in sustaining a like objection to the following question: "Q. State whether or not you would have had opportunity to work out, to any greater extent, as this child grew older?"

(6) That the court erred in ruling upon its own motion in striking certain of the testimony of Josephine Sceba from the record, as above set forth.

(7) That the court erred in sustaining the objection of counsel for defendant to the following question asked Nina Lorenz: "Q. What was her disposition, Miss Lorenz, as to being an obedient child?"

The 23d assignment of error is to the effect that the court in its charge to the jury erred in that the cost of the burial was emphasized, and practically and in effect made the sole basis of damages, if the jury should find for the plaintiff. The 25th, 26th, and 27th assignments of error are based upon the portion of the charge above set forth. The 28th assignment of error is to the effect that the court erred in that it did not instruct the jury as to the proper and lawful manner of computing the damages or as to the elements of damages to the plaintiff, if the jury should find the defendant negligent as charged, which caused the death of Rosalia Sceba. The 29th assignment of error is to the effect that the court erred in denying the motion of plaintiff to set aside the verdict of the jury and the judgment entered thereon, and to grant a new trial for the reasons set forth in said motion. The 2d, 3d, 4th, 5th, and 6th assignments of error will be considered together. We note the fact that the rulings upon which error is assigned in the 3d and 5th assignments of error do not appear to have been excepted to, but the ruling of the court in striking from the record certain testimony covered by the 6th assignment of error was duly excepted to.

(2) A careful perusal of this record has satisfied us that there was prejudicial error in the rulings of the court relating to the testimony of Josephine Sceba. In the earlier cases of Cooper v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 66 Mich. 261, 11 Am. St. Rep. 482, 33 N. W. 306; Rajnowski v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. 74 Mich. 20, 41 N. W. 849; Hurst v. Detroit City R. Co. 84 Mich. 539, 48 N. W. 44; Charlebois v. Gegobic & M. River R. Co. 91 Mich. 59, 51 N. W. 812; and Snyder v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 131 Mich. 418, 91 N. W. 643, it was the practice to offer testimony generally, consisting of the judgment or opinion of witnesses as to the probable earnings, on the one hand, and cost or expense of rearing a child until majority, upon the other; and it was held that testimony throwing any light upon what the pecuniary injury resulting from death would be was admissible. And in the Hurst Case this court said: "Some pecuniary injury or loss must be shown by the evidence." In the Charlebois Case it was said that the plaintiff must show that some person had suffered some pecuniary injury by the death, and that the statute did not imply that damages and pecuniary loss necessarily followed from the negligent killing. In the Rajnowski Case, it was held that "the testimony of witnesses who are shown by their knowledge or experience to be qualified to express an opinion upon the pecuniary value of such a life is admissible, not for the purpose of controlling, but of aiding, the jury in arriving at a just conclusion."

In the Cooper Case a judgment of $1,550 upon the death of a girl eleven years of age was sustained; and it was held that the jury could not give damages founded upon their fancy or based upon visionary estimates of probabilities or chances. In the Snyder Case the action of the lower court in refusing to set aside, as inadequate, a verdict of $250 for negligently causing the death of a boy between eleven and twelve years old, was sustained.

In the case of Black v. Michigan C. R. Co. 146 Mich. 568, 109 N. W. 1052, this court did not hold that such evidence, as above referred to, was not admissible, but did hold that where evidence had been given as to the age, calling, and condition of health of the father, and of the age and condition of the mother, together with evidence that the child was healthy, intelligent, of a good disposition, and obedient to its parents, that was sufficient to authorize an award of substantial damages; and the court, in that case, refused to set aside a verdict of $1,500 damages. Justice Moore, who wrote the opinion of the court, after quoting the reasons of the circuit judge in his denial of a motion for a new trial, and after calling attention to the cases of Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. 94 Mo. 286, 6 S. W. 464, and Chicago v. Hering, 83 Ill. 204, 25 Am. Rep. 378, and other authorities, concluded his opinion in these words: "The jurors have all been boys. The average juror knows the conditions which surround a boy in a family like that of plaintiff. We think it cannot be said, as a matter of law, that there was no basis upon which to find a verdict for pecuniary loss."

This case has since been cited with approval.

Applying either rule of evidence, as indicated by the above-named cases, we think the ruling of the trial court was prejudicially erroneous in refusing to permit Josephine Sceba to answer the question, "What was her disposition as to being kindly, tractable, and obedient?" and the question covered by the 4th assignment of error, and in striking out the testimony referred to by the court, covered by the 6th assignment of error. It is no answer to say that the mother did not testify in dollars and cents as to the value of the child's earnings, or the expense of maintenance. She had testified generally as to the nature and extent of those services, and the expense she had been put to in clothing the child. Her opinion or judgment, whether the child's efforts, and the benefits derived from her services, would in the future increase or diminish, was admissible. We think she was competent to testify upon that subject. Such testimony would not be mere speculation, conclusion, or sentiment, but would have had a tendency to prove pecuniary damage. By the rulings above referred to, the jury were deprived of testimony which would probably have aided them in reaching a substantial verdict in the case.

In denying the motion for a new trial, the trial judge said: "There wasn't a word of proof in the case as to what it would cost to maintain this child, or any other child, or what it could earn, or what any other child could earn. There was some proof—a little—as to what the child did."

In our opinion, the principal reason why there was no evidence upon those subjects was because of the adverse rulings of the court in dealing with the testimony of Josephine Sceba. The infirmity in the charge of the court was that, having erroneously narrowed the subject of the inquiry of the jury, by the rulings above referred to, the doctrine of the Black Case was not referred to, but was wholly ignored; so that the jury had no basis for the assessment of damages beyond the funeral expenses. We note the fact, however, that the plaintiff did not present any requests to charge, upon this subject, and we should hesitate to reverse the case upon the charge alone.

(3) It has been held by many courts, including those cited in the Black Case, that the law presumes, in the case of the death of a minor child by wrongful act, that there has been a loss for which compensation may be given under the statute; and that the loss may be estimated from the facts proved, in connection with the knowledge and experience possessed by all persons in relation to matters of common observation. 8 R. C. L. p. 835, § 111, citing many cases. While the verdict appears to have shocked the sense of the trial judge, had there been no errors in the rulings and charge, as indicated, we should not feel like holding that the damages awarded were wholly inadequate as matter of law. But we are satisfied that the amount of the verdict was the result of the errors above pointed out, and that the jury were too much circumscribed in their inquiry by the rulings and charge.

(4) The witness Nina Lorenz, the teacher of the child, was asked a question, above referred to, which, being objected to as incompetent and immaterial, the court excluded, using the language, "Sustained so far as school is concerned," to which ruling plaintiff's counsel excepted. We hardly understand the purport of this ruling. We think it was competent for this witness, or any other person acquainted with the child, to testify to her disposition and habits of obedience. The record shows, however, that this witness later gave testimony as to the general disposition of the child, and we only refer to this ruling because it was consistent with other rulings which narrowed the scope of the jury's inquiry, and led to the verdict and judgment in the case.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment of the court below is reversed, and a new trial granted.

Annotation—Admissibility of opinion evidence to show pecuniary loss in action for wrongful death.

For other notes in this series relative to the admissibility, character, or sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss by negligently killing a person, see note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056, where the different notes presenting different aspects of this matter are referred to at length.

General subject of the right of a witness to express an opinion on a non-technical subject because of the impossibility or difficulty of reproducing the data is discussed in State v. Prüett, L.R.A.1918A, 656.

As a rule the amount of damages recoverable for wrongful death, from their very nature are not provable by direct evidence or by the opinion of witnesses. In general the opinion of a witness as to the amount which would compensate a statutory beneficiary for the pecuniary loss by the death complained of would be of no greater value than the opinion of individual members of the jury, and to the latter the statute delegates the power as well as the duty to assess such pecuniary loss. In assessing this loss it is the province of the jury to use their own judgment and experience in life, rather than that of any witness.<sup>1</sup>

In some matters, however, as an aid to the jury opinion evidence is received. Thus, as pointed out in a note appended to Ruehl v. Lidgerwood Rural Teleph. Co. ante, 1071, the use of mortality tables is very generally indulged in to aid the jury in ascertaining the life expectancy of the deceased and his beneficiaries, although these tables are purely a matter of opinion or computation based upon mortuary records of a large number of people for a given period of time. And the computation of experts as to expectancy of the life of the deceased, based upon these tables, may be received in evidence, and experts may testify therefrom as to the probable duration of the life of the deceased had he not been killed.<sup>2</sup>

As to the value of services or amount of earnings.

Opinion evidence may be based upon very intimate knowledge of and relationship with the deceased, and in this regard the witness may stand in a better position to judge than the jury does. Under these circumstances, at least where the evidence relates to a matter of value, opinion evidence by such a wit-

<sup>1</sup>As to the measure of damages it is proper for the jury to exercise their own judgment upon the facts in proof by considering them in connection with their own knowledge and experience which they are supposed to possess in common with the generality of mankind. It is not necessary or proper that witnesses should have expressed an opinion as to the amount of such pecuniary loss. Chicago v. Major (1857) 18 Ill. 349, 68 Am. Dec. 553.

Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Maxwell (1910) 61 Tex. Civ. App. 80, 128 S. W. 160, holding that the amount of damages suffered from personal injuries outside of the expenses incurred for medical bills, nursing, etc., are in their very nature not provable by witnesses. Should a witness undertake to state what would compensate a party for physical and mental suffering, he would simply be giving his opinion of the matter based on the circumstances proved. He is in no better position to form a correct conclusion than are the jury. The jury must form their conclusions from their general knowledge and principles applied to the facts and evidence, and to nothing else.

Union P. R. Co. v. Dunden (1887) 37 Kan. 1, 14 Pac. 501, holding it unnecessary that any witnesses should have expressed an opinion as to the amount of pecuniary loss, for the damages are to be assessed by the jury with reference to the pecuniary injury sustained by the next of kin in consequence of the death complained of, including not only the actual present loss which the death produces and which can be proved, but also prospective losses. How these pecuniary damages are to be measured, or what shall be the amount, is left largely to the discretion of the jury.

St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hitt (1905) 76 Ark. 227, 88 S. W. 908, rehearing denied in (1905) 76 Ark. 234, 88 S. W. 990, holding that a life insurance agent is competent to testify as to the expectancy of the life of the deceased as shown by mortality tables, and he may estimate the amount required to purchase an annuity equal to the decedent's income.

beneficiary is as great or greater than that of the deceased, as is also evidence on the part of the defendant tending to show that the life expectancy of the beneficiary is less than that of the deceased.

<sup>2</sup>Joliet v. Blower (1893) 49 Ill. App. 464, holding that computations by experts as to the expectancy of life of the decedent based upon authorized tables of general use may be received in evidence.

Louisville, C. & L. R. Co. v. Mahony (1870) 7 Bush (Ky.) 235, holding that witnesses may testify as to the probable period of the decedent's life by reference to recognized American life tables.

Steinbrunner v. Pittsburgh & W. R. Co. (1891) 146 Pa. 504, 28 Am. St. Rep. 806, 23 Atl. 239, holding that a witness may give his testimony as to the life expectancy of a decedent where based upon mortality tables of recognized standard.

San Antonio & A. P. R. Co. v. Bennett (1890) 76 Tex. 151, 13 S. W. 319, holding that witnesses may testify from mortality tables as to the number of years the deceased would probably have lived had it not been for the wrongful act causing his death.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Compton (1890) 75 Tex. 667, 13 S. W. 667, holding that opinion evidence by experts is admissible as to probable duration of life of the deceased.

But see Erb v. Popritz (1898) 59 Kan. 264, 64 Am. St. Rep. 362, 52 Pac. 871, holding that testimony is not competent to show the probable duration of life of decedent where based entirely upon knowledge obtained by the witness from life tables.

It has been held, however, that, where amount which it would cost to purchase an annuity equal to the amount of the decedent's income, based upon the probable duration of his life had he survived, is incompetent as bearing upon the question of damages. Hinsdale v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1903) 81 App. Div. 617, 81 N. Y. Supp. 356; Fajardo v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1903) 84 App. Div. 354, 82 N. Y. Supp. 912; Mix v. Hamburg-American S. S. Co. (1903) 85 App. Div. 475, 83 N. Y. Supp. 322.

ness is admissible as an aid to the jury in assessing the pecuniary loss to parents by the destruction of the life of a child. For example, a parent may testify as to the value of a child's services in the family and his earnings as compared with the cost of his maintenance;<sup>3</sup> or as to his probable future earnings;<sup>4</sup> or the probable value to him of the decedent's services where the latter had aided him in his work.<sup>5</sup> And in an action for the negligent killing of a five-year-old boy, parents who have reared children may testify as to the net value of the decedent's services during minority, based upon their experience and the evidence in this case.<sup>6</sup> In the same jurisdiction, however, it has been held by a divided court that opinion evidence was incompetent as to the value of the decedent's life to his family where based upon matters already in evidence, including mortality tables.<sup>7</sup>

<sup>3</sup>SCERA v. MANISTEE R. Co. ante, 1090, holding that evidence is admissible, in an action by the mother of a child negligently killed, to show how the cost of the maintenance of the child compared with the benefits derived from her services. Although the child was only a trifle over five years of age, she may testify that these benefits would increase as the child grew older.

Atrops v. Costello (1894) 8 Wash. 149, 35 Pac. 620, holding where damages are claimed by parents for the future earnings of a child then attending school, evidence is admissible as to the probable value of such earnings, taking into consideration the expense of the future schooling of the child for clothing, lodging, maintenance, etc.

<sup>4</sup>Snyder v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1902) 131 Mich. 418, 91 N. W. 643, holding that in an action to recover compensation for the death of a boy between eleven and twelve years of age, it is competent for the father to testify as to when the boy would become sufficiently proficient in a trade in which he had shown aptitude to earn money, and as to the amount he would thus earn.

Compare with Nave v. Alabama G. S. R. Co. (1892) 96 Ala. 264, 11 So. 391, holding that where deceased was a boy sixteen years old, and employed as a flagman, evidence is not admissible as to what his services would be worth when he reached the age of twenty-one years if he had lived.

<sup>5</sup>Kansas City, M. & O. R. Co. v. Starr (1917) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 194 S. W. 637, holding that opinion evidence by the father of decedent is admissible as to the probable value to him of the services of the deceased, a boy eleven years old when killed, had he lived to reach the age of fifteen years.

<sup>6</sup>Rajnowski v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1889) 74 Mich. 20, 41 N. W. 847, holding that, as bearing upon the pecuniary value of the life of a young child during minority, witnesses who have reared children from infancy to manhood are competent to express their opinion upon the value of the life in question.

<sup>7</sup>Klanowski v. Grand Trunk R. Co. (1885) 57 Mich. 525, 24 N. W. 801, holding to be incompetent testimony as to the pecuniary value of the life of the deceased to his family, where the opinion of the witness is based upon matters already in evidence, together with life tables used by the witness in making his computation.

<sup>8</sup>Storrs v. Grand Rapids (1896) 110 Mich. 483, 68 N. W. 258, holding that evidence may be given as to the present worth of the decedent's services, based upon his expectancy of life and upon different assumptions as to his earning capacity.

<sup>9</sup>Craig v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1916) 97 Neb. 586, 150 N. W. 648, holding that the husband may testify as to the value of his wife's services in an action to recover for her wrongful death.

Dillon v. Hudson, P. & S. Electric R. Co. (1905) 73 N. E. 367, 62 Atl. 93, holding where the earning capacity of the decedent is an element of damage for her wrongful death, evidence of the value of her services as housekeeper in her husband's family is competent.

It has also been held that evidence is admissible as to the present worth of the decedent's services for his life expectancy based upon different assumptions as to his earning capacity.<sup>8</sup> And opinion evidence is admissible as to the value of the services of the deceased to her husband as housekeeper.<sup>9</sup>

It has been held that opinion evidence is admissible as to the market value, in the vicinity of the decedent's place of residence, of the services of the manager of a newspaper having a circulation substantially similar to the one of which the decedent was the manager at the time he was killed;<sup>10</sup> but opinion evidence is not admissible as to the amount decedent might earn in some occupation other than that which he was pursuing at the time he met his death;<sup>11</sup> nor is opinion evidence admissible as to the amount the decedent's services would have been worth when he reached majority had he lived.<sup>12</sup> Where the decedent was a farmer, opinion evidence was held admissible as to the probable receipts from the farm while he operated it, this being the best evidence procurable under the circumstances.<sup>13</sup>

IOWA SUPREME COURT.

MRS. EDNA E. NICOLL, Admr., etc., of Walter H. McNulty, Deceased,
v.

MRS. EMMA R. SWEET, Admr., etc., of
S. S. Sweet, Deceased, Appt.

(163 Iowa, 683, 144 N. W. 615.)

Death — negligent injury — predisposition.

1. One causing pneumonia in another by a negligent injury cannot escape liability for his resulting death by the fact that his state of health predisposed him to such disease

For other cases, see Death, II. a, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — sufficiency — death — proximate cause — pneumonia following injury.

2. That the pneumonia was caused by the injury may be found where there is, on the one hand, testimony that the person for whose wrongful death the action is brought was not in robust health at the time of the injury, that he had recently suffered from bronchitis and had some indications of weakness of the lungs; and, on the other hand, that the pneumonia which caused his death was of traumatic origin, and that from such an injury as the deceased had suffered pneumonia is likely to follow as a natural consequence.

For other cases, see Evidence, XII. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — res ipsa loquitur — fall of cornice.

3. The doctrine of res ipsa loquitur applies where a cornice falls from a building into the street, to the injury of a passer-by.

For other cases, see Evidence, II. h, 1, f, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note.—As to character and sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss to estate of decedent, see annotation following this case, post, 1111. For other questions in relation to evidence bearing on measure of damages in action for death, see references in the first part of the annotation following Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056; and generally as to questions distinctive to the action for death, see L.R.A. Indexes under the titles, "Death" and "Damages," subtitles "Measure of compensation — Death."

Pre-existing disease or condition of person injured as affecting recovery from one negligently causing injury is treated in the L.R.A.1918C.

Trial — instruction — refusal.

4. The refusal of an instruction which is fully covered by instructions given by the court on its own motion is not error.

For other cases, see Trial, III. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — death — family left by deceased.

5. Where the measure of recovery for death of an individual is the value of his life to his estate had he not come to an untimely end, evidence as to the family left by him is admissible as bearing upon his incentive to habits of industry had he lived.

For other cases, see Evidence, XI. g, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — instruction — who may complain.

6. The error, if any, in an instruction, in an action for wrongful death, that the amount of damages to be assessed in favor of the estate of the deceased is not to be increased by reason of his leaving children, but that evidence of his children, and the number thereof, may be considered as bearing upon the question of his inducement or incentive to habits of industry had he lived, is not one of which defendant can complain.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. f, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — exclusion of evidence — non-prejudicial error.

7. The exclusion, in an action for wrongful death in which the issue is whether the injury to the deceased caused the pneumonia which occasioned his death, of evidence of a statement by deceased that he could not obtain life insurance because of his health, while erroneous, is not prejudicial, where the circumstances of his health were fully inquired into.

For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. m, 3, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

note to Jones v. Caldwell, 48 L.R.A.(N.S.) 119.

For excessiveness or inadequacy of damages for personal injuries resulting in death, see annotation following St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Craft, L.R.A.1916C, 820.

The applicability of the doctrine res ipsa loquitur in an action for injury on the highway, including injuries from falling objects, is treated in the note to Corbin v. Benton, 43 L.R.A.(N.S.) 591. Many other phases of the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur are considered in notes cited in the L.R.A. Indexes under the title "Evidence," subtitle "Care; negligence; res ipsa loquitur."

Evidence — admissibility — complaint of suffering.

8. In an action for wrongful death, complaints of the deceased of pain and suffering, made soon after his injury, are admissible as bearing upon the nature, extent, and location of his injuries.

For other cases, see Evidence, X. d, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Damages — amount — death.

9. $8,000 is not an excessive amount of damages for the loss to his estate occasioned by the death of a boiler maker having an expectancy of life of thirty-six years, and earning from $56 to $108 per month.

For other cases, see Damages, III. i, 4, b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(December 13, 1913.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for Benton County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for injuries to her husband, resulting in death, for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

Statement by Weaver, Ch. J.:

Action at law to recover damages against the estate of S. S. Sweet, deceased, on account of the death of one Walter H. McNulty. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals.

Messrs. Dawley & Wheeler and C. F. Jordan, for appellant:

Evidence that deceased left children, and as to their number and ages, was inadmissible for any purpose, and it was error to permit the jury to consider such evidence as an incentive to habits of industry.

Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 150, 12 N. W. 222; State v. Rutledge, 135 Iowa, 588, 113 N. W. 461; State ex rel. Pitham v. Wangler, 151 Iowa, 555, 132 N. W. 22; Dufree v. Wabash R. Co. 155 Iowa, 544, 136 N. W. 695.

The court ought to have instructed the jury as asked by defendant, that the table of mortality did not show the expectancy of men in poor health.

Hughes v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 150 Iowa, 232, 129 N. W. 956.

Defendant was entitled to show that deceased had said he could not get insurance because of his health, the same being competent as an admission of the deceased as against the representative of his estate.

There was not sufficient evidence to justify the submission to the jury of the question whether the injuries caused by the falling of the wall produced the pneumonia from which McNulty died, and a verdict should therefore have been directed for the defendant.

Evidence of the suffering of the deceased is competent for the purpose of showing that there was a connection between the injury and the pneumonia from which McNulty died. It helps to show the character and continuation of the injury.

Mr. C. W. E. Snyder also for appellee.

Weaver, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

McNulty was injured by the falling of a cornice into the public street from a building owned by Sweet. Eight days after the accident, McNulty died of pneumonia, which plaintiff alleges was caused by the injuries so received, and the claim of damages is based upon that theory.

It is strongly contended upon the part of the appellant that the record shows no evidence from which this fact could be found in favor of plaintiff. It is true that the testimony tends to show that McNulty was not in robust health at the time of his injury, that he had recently suffered from bronchitis and had some indications of weakness of the lungs; but the fact of ill health or physical weakness, if established or conceded, is by no means inconsistent with plaintiff's theory that the pneumonia which was the immediate cause of death was the direct result of the blow received from the falling brick. Indeed, such weakened condition, if it existed, may have rendered the deceased an easier victim of the fatal disease; yet, if there was evidence for the jury that the pneumonia was the direct result of the injury, and such injury was fairly chargeable to the negligence of Sweet, the state of the deceased's health would in no manner affect the right of action on the part of his administratrix, though it may have bearing on the amount of the recovery. That there was evidence to go to the jury on both questions is scarcely open to doubt. On the matter of the alleged negligence, the fall of the cornice doubtless presented a case for applying the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, to say nothing of other evidence bearing upon the situation. Concerning the relation of cause and effect between the injury received and the disease of which the intestate died, it may be said that the medical testimony on the part of plaintiff tended to show that the pneumonia was of traumatic origin; that is, pneumonia, the inciting cause of which was some physical violence or bodily injury. It is also shown that, from such an injury as the deceased suffered, pneumonia is likely to follow as a natural consequence. No other injury or efficient cause for the disease is suggested, and the question thus presented is one of fact, and not of law. Brownfield v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 107 Iowa, 254, 77 N. W. 1038, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 331; Lehman v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 153 Iowa, 124, 133 N. W. 327.

The jury was fairly and correctly instructed upon this proposition. The defendant's request for an instruction that the burden was upon plaintiff to show that the injuries to McNulty did cause pneumonia, and if she failed in this respect she could not recover, stated a correct legal proposition, but it was fully covered and stated in the instructions which the court gave upon its own motion.

The principal debatable question upon this appeal is the following: The surviving wife of McNulty, testifying as a witness, was permitted to say, over the objection of defendant, that the deceased left a family consisting of a wife and four children, ranging from one to ten years of age. Referring to this feature of the evidence, the court told the jury that, if they found the plaintiff entitled to recover, the amount of damage to be assessed in favor of the estate of the deceased "is not to be increased by reason of his having children which he left surviving him; evidence of his children and the number thereof being admitted by the court as having bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry in case the deceased had lived."

Error is assigned upon the admission of the testimony and upon the instruction to which we have referred. It is to be admitted that authority is to be found for the position of the appellant, and cases are not wanting in which recoveries in actions for damages sustained by reason of the death of a person have been set aside because of admission of proof that the deceased left wife and children surviving him. It is a matter, however, on which the precedents are not in harmony, and a majority of this court, after quite careful deliberation, is of the opinion that the better reason is with the rule holding the evidence competent. Practically the only objection of any plausibility to its admission is that its tendency is to excite the sympathies of the jurors and induce undue liberality in the assessment of damages. But, as is well known to all persons who have observed the course of litigation in matters of this kind, it is utterly futile to hope to keep the fact from the knowledge of the jury. More often than otherwise the widow and children are in the court room. If not, the facts concerning the victim of a fatal accident, his family and their circumstances, are public property, upon every tongue; they are mentioned in public print, talked about on the street corners and places where men meet and congregate; they crop out incidentally in the court room; and, even though the evidence be rigidly excluded on the trial, no juror enters upon the consideration of his verdict in ignorance of the actual situation in this respect. Even as a mere matter of protection of the interests of the defendant, it is at least an open question whether it is not better that the testimony of all these conditions surrounding the deceased at the time of his injury should be admitted under the sanction of an oath, and its bearing and effect regulated and controlled by appropriate instructions. If it be said that a juror's sympathies may control his actions even to the extent of disregarding the court's instructions, that suggestion, if sound, is not less applicable where the influencing fact comes to the juror's knowledge from sources other than the testimony, or by absorption from the atmosphere in which the case has been tried. But the average jury is not made up of weaklings. Its members as a rule have an intelligent conception of their duties and obligations.

that the only true measure of recovery for the death of an individual is the value of his life to his estate, had he not come to such untimely end. It is hardly too much to say that this rule is vague, uncertain, and speculative, if not conjectural, but it is the best which judicial wisdom and experience have yet been able to formulate. No evidence is possible of the time which deceased would have lived but for the injury complained of. Had he avoided this injury, death might have met him the next day, week, or year in some other form. In business he might have become a phenomenal success and accumulated millions, or he might have lived to old age and died a pauper. From being a man of good habits and prudence and industry, he might have become a spendthrift or a tramp; or, if a man of dissolute habits, he might have reformed into an efficient and prosperous citizen. But the demands of justice will not tolerate the idea that human life may be extinguished by the tort of another without the wrongdoer being held to answer therefor in damages, and the rule we have stated is the one which has been devised for this purpose. The principle which underlies it is of unquestionable soundness, but the difficulty which besets its practical application is in the fact that it calls for an estimate or conclusion which must be arrived at by a balancing of mere probabilities and possibilities which we deduce by way of inference from the age, character, habits, condition, education, employment, surroundings, and apparent capacity of the deceased. Fairness to the beneficiaries of the estate, on the one hand, and the defendant, on the other, requires that the jury be put in possession of all the facts having the slightest legitimate bearing upon this intricate problem. It is concededly the law of this state that in such case the plaintiff may show that the deceased was a married man. Wheelan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. 85 Iowa, 178, 52 N. W. 119. This is said to be competent because "it may fairly be assumed that a married man will be more frugal and industrious and hence will accumulate a larger estate than a single man." Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 168, 12 N. W. 222.

In Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 290, 87 Am. Dec. 391, the question presented in the case now before us was raised in the following manner: The action, like the one at bar, was brought by the administrator to recover damages for the death of his intestate. Plaintiff offered testimony showing the family of the deceased and their respective ages, as well as his occupation, earnings, and accumulations. The defendant objected thereto on the ground that the inquiries were improper, immaterial, and not the correct method for the ascertainment of the damages. The trial court instructed the jury that, if plaintiff was found entitled to recover, he would be entitled to recover such damages as the estate of deceased had suffered by reason of his death, and nothing should be allowed on account of his pain and suffering before death, or for the grief and distress of the family, or for their loss of his society. Passing upon the defendant's assignment of error in this respect, this court then said: "When a jury is thus guarded against an allowance of damages for improper causes, it would seem that no prejudice could result if the jury should be fully advised . . . of the exact situation of the deceased, his occupation, annual earnings, age, health, habits, family, and estate. Many of these, and possibly other facts, may have just influence in determining the pecuniary damage to the estate. We would not be understood, however, as determining that evidence as to the number and ages of his children is strictly proper." It would seem from this quotation that, while the statement of facts and argument indulged in by the court indicated its view that the testimony was admissible, yet, as in any event its admission was not prejudicial, the question whether it was technically or "strictly proper" was left undecided.

In the later case of Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 150, 12 N. W. 222, three members of the court held to the view that such evidence was inadmissible, while the other two, Beck and Rothrock, JJ., reached the opposite conclusion. Somewhat singularly the Donaldson Case was not referred to and was apparently overlooked. Indeed, there was no discussion of authorities except a brief mention of Simonson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 49 Iowa, 87, where it was held generally that the jury was entitled to know all the circumstances surrounding the deceased, affecting his capacity and disposition for earning a living. Since that time the Beems Case has been cited in a criminal case (State v. Rutledge, 135 Iowa, 581, 113 N. W. 461) and a bastardy case (State ex rel. Pitham v. Wangler, 151 Iowa, 555, 132 N. W. 22), but under circumstances so foreign to those with which we are now dealing that they cannot be said to be in point. As applied to the question before us, we think it must be said that the authority of that precedent has not only been discredited, but abandoned.

Bearing upon that proposition, let us first notice that in Hunt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. 26 Iowa, 363; Simonson v. Chicago, R. L.R.A.1918C.

I. & P. R. Co. supra, and Moore v. Central R. Co. 47 Iowa, 692, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 657, we held it competent for the plaintiff in a personal injury case to prove that the injured person was a poor man and had a family dependent upon him for support. In the Simonson Case it was said: "The jury was entitled to see [the deceased] as he was viewed with reference to his prospective capacity and disposition for earning and saving money. No data could be given them for a computation. Taking [deceased] as he was shown to them, it was for them to say, from their knowledge of business life and all its contingencies, . . . what was the pecuniary injury sustained . . . in reference to his prospective estate." In this connection it is further said that either party might have shown his habits in regard to the use of intoxicating liquor "and in regard to anything else which affected his prospective savings and earnings."

In Stafford v. Oskaloosa, 64 Iowa, 258, 20 N. W. 178, the question was again raised, and, after citing approvingly the Hunt, Moore, and Simonson Cases, the court proceeds to notice the Beems Case as follows: "But in the subsequent case of Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. supra, it is held by a majority of the court that evidence of the number of the intestate's family, although offered simply as a circumstance tending to stimulate his industry and economy, was incompetent. The majority of the court, as now constituted, are content to adhere to the holding in Hunt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. and Moore v. Central R. Co. and the grounds on which the holding is placed."

In the later case of Fish v. Illinois C. R. Co. 96 Iowa, 707, 65 N. W. 997, where the question was raised upon the competency of evidence showing accumulations of the deceased, reliance was placed by the defendant upon the Beems Case, where the majority seems to class proof of this character with proof of the family relations of the deceased, and holds both incompetent. Upon this objection the court again remarks: "All that can be said of that case is that it denies the right of showing accumulations with a view to enhance damages because of it, but the case recognizes the right to show that deceased was dependent on his earnings, and had no money, as a probable inducement to industry. . . . It is not intended by what is said in this opinion to commit this court, as now organized, to an approval or disapproval of the rule of Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. should the question therein . . . as to such evidence hereafter arise."

In Lowe v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 89 Iowa, 420, 56 N. W. 519, evidence was admitted apparently without question that the deceased was married, left no estate, and that his earnings had been applied to the support of his wife and family; and the court in its opinion cites these facts as circumstances to be considered in estimating the value of his life to his estate.

In the Wheelan Case, 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119, the court cites the Beems Case in support of the proposition that, in finding the value of the life of a man to his estate, evidence of his age, habits, health, means, business, and his married or single estate, is admissible.

In Dufree v. Wabash R. Co. 155 Iowa, 544, 136 N. W. 695, the plaintiff having shown the wages earned by the deceased, it was developed on cross-examination that he was saving none of his earnings and had no property. On redirect examination plaintiff was permitted to show that deceased was supporting a wife and three children. The defendant assigned error upon this ruling and cited Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. in support of its position. The authority of that precedent was not discussed by the court, for we held that the evidence was admissible in any event as an explanation of the fact that deceased was not making any savings. It is difficult, however, to understand upon what theory the explanation would be material or pertinent if the rule of the Beems Case is sound, or if the fact itself has no legitimate bearing on the question of the value of the life of the deceased to his estate.

It is evident from the foregoing that this court has never directly or distinctly reaffirmed Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. so far as it relates to this question, but, on the contrary, has shown a distinct disinclination to do so; and that, taking our cases along this line as a whole, and the reasoning upon which they have been decided, they may fairly be said to affirm the competency of the evidence admitted by the trial court.

For reasons already suggested, most of the adjudicated cases from other states are not specially helpful in this discussion, but there are some in which principles quite analogous to those we here approve have been applied. For example, in Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun, 34, it was held proper to admit such evidence on the theory that it was proper for the jury to be advised in a general way of the situation and condition in life of the party injured. In Missouri, contrary, perhaps, to the general trend of cases in that state, it was held admissible to show the existence of wife and family, not as in itself a ground of damage, but to inform the jury of the person's condition and situation in life. Winters v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. 39 Mo. 468.

The state of Alabama has a statute which its courts have so interpreted that, if it appear that the deceased consumed his wages in support of his family and was making no accumulations, the measure of recovery is limited to the loss so occasioned; but, if he was making any savings, then the administrator may recover, as in this state, the entire present value of the estate which the deceased would probably have accumulated had he lived. Alabama Mineral R. Co. v. Jones, 114 Ala. 519, 62 Am. St. Rep. 121, 21 So. 507, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 551 and cases there cited. Applying this statute, the court in the cited case says: "As a circumstance aiding the solution of this question, it was competent to show how many and what dependents there were and their ages."

The Nebraska statute is unlike our own in that the right of action is given for injury to the support of dependent relatives; but the reasoning of that court upon the competency of evidence tending to show the extent of such loss is very applicable in cases like the one at bar. There, in an action by a father for the death of a son, the court says that the fact of the existence of a mother and other children was entirely admissible, "not as a direct ground for the jury's action, but as showing what deceased was doing and likely to do to make his life pecuniarily valuable to plaintiff." If such fact is evidence of what the deceased was doing or likely to do to make his life of pecuniary value to the parent, it is no less competent to show the pecuniary value of his life to his estate, where the right of recovery is for its benefit. [South Omaha Waterworks Co. v. Vocasek, 62 Neb. 710, 87 N. W. 536, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 580.]

It is held in Wisconsin that in an action by the widow of the deceased, or for her benefit, although she is entitled to recover only for the pecuniary damage resulting to herself, she may prove the number and ages of her children. Hamann v. Milwaukee Bridge Co. 136 Wis. 39, 116 N. W. 854.

It is to be said also that the precedents from other states relied upon by the appellant, holding it incompetent to show the fact that the deceased left a family of children, are equally unanimous in holding it improper to show that he was a married man, or otherwise show to the jury the facts as to his domestic or family relations. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Collinsworth, 45 Fla. 403, 33 So. 513; Stockton v. Frey, 4 Gill. 406, 45 Am. Dec. 138; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 26 C. C. A. 626, 54 U. S. App. 110, 81 Fed. 807; Sealer v. Rolfe

Coal & Coke Co. 51 W. Va. 327, 41 S. E. 216, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 571. The majority opinion in the Beems Case departs from this rule so far as relates to the married condition of the deceased, and we have committed ourselves to the same view in several cases, as already noted.

But it is scarcely possible to conceive of any good reason for admitting proof that defendant had a wife, which does not equally apply to the fact that he had children. In the Beems Case both majority and minority justified the admission of the former upon the sufficient ground that "from observation and experience it may fairly be assumed that a married man will be more frugal and industrious, and hence will accumulate a larger estate than a single man;" but, having said this, the opinion proceeds with palpable disregard of the logic of the situation and of its own concession to hold it improper to show the existence of children, and state as a reason therefor that "observation and experience do not teach that one's income is likely to increase in the same ratio as the number of his children." It would have been scarcely less pertinent to have said that observation and experience do not show that, other things being equal, a married man lives longer than a single man. It is sufficient answer to either to say that no one contends otherwise, and the quip with which the competency of the testimony is there turned aside does not partake of the character of argument. If it be true (and it stands admitted in this court) that proof that deceased was a married man is of some probative force in estimating the probable value of his life to his estate because the responsibilities of wedlock tend to stimulate him to industry, prudence, and economy, shall the court shut its eyes to the equally patent fact that a child or children in the family, whether one or many, has an equal, if not greater, influence in the same direction? It may be said that the dependent members of a man's household may be so numerous as to exhaust his earnings and decrease rather than increase the likelihood of his accumulating an estate. This is true, and in such case the defense is in no position to complain of the admission of the testimony. The writer has been unable to find that any court in any other jurisdiction has drawn any distinction between the admissibility of proof that the deceased in such cases was a married man and proof that he left children.

We have already called attention to the peculiar difficulties surrounding the presentation and trial of these cases, and to the fact that, when all is said, the issue goes to the jury for what we have called a balancing of the probabilities and possibilities of the extent of that financial success, if any, which would have attended the life of the deceased, had his career not been prematurely arrested by the negligence complained of. We think that no impartial arbitrator, to whom that question might be submitted, would fail to inquire and ascertain, so far as practicable, not only what the deceased had already done or accomplished and the facts as to his age, health, capacity, and earning powers, but also as to his exact situation in life and the surroundings and influences, if any, which, according to common knowledge and observation, tend to the development of industry and thrift. It is to be remembered that actions of this nature were unknown to the common law. The right thereto is a creature of statute, and investigation will show that the provisions made in the different states are of such varying character that decisions thereunder afford few precedents of much value except in the jurisdictions where they have been announced. As the action is not of common-law origin and the injury to be compensated for involves investigation into matters not before made the subject of judicial inquiry, it is not surprising that the rules of evidence therein should become involved in apparent confusion, though it is to be said that, when we consider the different statutes of the various states, the confusion is perhaps more apparent than real,—a situation to which the compilers and annotators of decisions have not always given due attention. The construction and administration of our own statute is, of course, a matter for our own courts; and, notwithstanding there has been some uncertainty of expression with reference to the proper limitations upon the introduction of evidence, we think we are fairly committed to principles and rules recognizing the materiality and competency of testimony such as we have now under consideration. We also think them fully sustained by sound reasoning and the teachings of human experience. The assignment of error upon the admission of this testimony is therefore overruled.

It is next said that the court's instruction to the jury that the amount of plaintiffs' damage, if any, was not to be increased by reason of the deceased having left children, and that evidence concerning the children had been admitted only as bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to industry in the deceased, is contradictory and misleading. We find nothing in the instruction of which appellant can complain. The attempt of the court to limit the effect of the testimony was favorable to the defense. It said to the jury in effect that the mere fact that the deceased had children who survived him was not in itself a ground for the recovery of damages, but that if the plaintiff was found otherwise entitled to recover it might be considered for what it was worth as bearing upon deceased's incentives to industry. If we are correct in holding the testimony admissible at all, then the limitation tended to restrict rather than to enlarge the plaintiff's right of recovery, and defendant has suffered no prejudice. Whether such restriction was called for under the record we need not decide.

Error is assigned upon the ruling of the court striking out testimony of a statement by the deceased that he could not obtain life insurance because of his health. We think the testimony should not have been stricken because it was a circumstance, though one of slight importance, bearing upon his condition of health, and consequently upon his expectancy of life and ability to labor; but these circumstances and conditions were quite fully inquired into, and we think the exclusion of this particular item was not a prejudicial error.

The same may be said of one or two other similar rulings. There was no error in admitting complaints made by the deceased of pain and suffering soon after his injury. It is true the administrator was not entitled to recover for the pain and suffering sustained by the deceased, and the jury were so instructed, but the rule which admits the complaints of the injured person as bearing upon the nature, extent, and location of his injuries is quite elementary. Hamilton v. Mendota Coal & Min. Co. 120 Iowa, 149, 94 N. W. 282, 13 Am. Neg. Rep. 639; 7 Enc. Ev. 386.

The complaint that the damages allowed ($8,000) are excessive cannot be sustained. The deceased was still a young man, with an expectancy of life of thirty-six years. He was a boiler maker, earning from $56 to $108 per month; and while, as we have said, he was probably not a man of robust health, he was engaged in labor at his trade, and, so far as appears, was in no respect incapacitated to pursue the same, and no circumstances are disclosed rendering it necessarily improbable that he would live out his expectancy, maintaining the physical efficiency of the average man.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

Evans, Gaynor, Withrow, and Ladd, JJ., concur.

Preston, J., dissenting:

I regret that I am unable to agree with L.R.A.1918C.

my associates in regard to the admissibility of the evidence as to the number of children and instruction No. 11½ on that subject. I shall set out the record more fully than has been done in the majority opinion.

Plaintiff, Mrs. Nicoll, formerly Mrs. McNulty, was permitted to testify over objections as follows:

Q. Did he leave any family other than yourself?

Did he have any children?

The court: It is not admitted for the purpose of affecting damages in any way, but it is done for some other purpose.

A. Four.

Q. What were their ages at the time of his death?

A. The oldest was ten, the youngest was a little over a year old.

In this connection, the court gave the following instruction: "(11½) You are instructed that there can be no recovery in this case for pain and suffering endured by the deceased resulting from the injury received by him, and you are also instructed that the remarriage of the widow of the deceased is not to be considered by you in diminishing the amount of damages sustained by said estate, if any you find. And, on the other hand, the amount of damages, if any you find, is not to be increased by reason of the deceased having children that he left surviving him; evidence of his children and the number thereof being admitted by the court solely as bearing upon the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry in case the deceased had lived."

It is urged by appellant that admitting the evidence as to the children was erroneous; that the latter part of the instruction did authorize the jury to enhance the damages by reason of deceased having left children; and that the last two sentences therein are in conflict with each other. It may seem that, even though this evidence was not admissible, the exception taken to its admission was canceled by the instruction of the court that the damages were not to be increased by reason of the fact that deceased left children surviving. It has been held that where the verdict is not excessive, and the court instructed the jury to disregard the evidence, the error in admitting it is not fatal. 13 Cyc. 197, and cases, some of which are to the contrary. But it is claimed by appellant that the verdict is excessive, and that the instruction did not cure the error because the latter part of it did authorize the jury to enhance the damages. The object in introducing this evidence was, no doubt, to inform the jury that deceased had infant children dependent upon him for support. It is impossible to determine how far the assessment of damages was controlled by this evidence as to plaintiffs' family of small children. The reasonable inference is that it had some influence upon the verdict. The damages in such cases are more or less uncertain in any event, and the evidence should be limited to legitimate elements of damage. Appellant contends that the question as to the admissibility of such evidence has been settled in the case of Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 58 Iowa, 150, 12 N. W. 222, and that it is not admissible for any purpose in a case of this character. Appellee says that case was a three to two decision; that it is not in harmony with prior holdings, has not been followed since, is unsound; and that it has been an open question in this state for thirty years. It appears to me that the tendency of our former cases is to exclude such evidence. The question as to evidence in regard to children was not involved in the Stafford Case, 64 Iowa, 258, 20 N. W. 178, or the Wheelan Case, 85 Iowa, 167, 52 N. W. 119, and many of the other cases cited in the majority opinion. It is being now decided for the first time in this jurisdiction, or any other, so far as I am able to discover, that such evidence is competent, under such a statute as ours, where the question is as to damages to the estate.

As stated, some of the cases hold that the evidence is not competent, but that if the court instructs the jury that it must not be considered as affecting damages, and the damages are not excessive, there is no prejudice. Other cases hold that, if such evidence is admitted and the verdict is excessive, it may be cured by remittitur, because the only effect of the evidence is to enhance the recovery. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Batsel, 100 Ark. 526, 140 S. W. 726. Though this is denied in Jones & A. Co. v. George, 227 Ill. 64, 81 N. E. 4, 10 Ann. Cas. 285, to which I shall again refer.

But the cases all hold that the evidence is incompetent. I am not prepared to say that a reversal should follow in every case where the evidence as to children is admitted. Cases might arise where the court instructed the jury squarely to not consider it as affecting damages and where the evidence is such that it could be fairly said that the verdict is not excessive and that there was no prejudice. But that is not the question being now determined. The question is: Is the evidence competent? The fact that jurors may learn about it on the street corners, or in the public prints, or incidentally in the court room, is not, as L.R.A.1918C.

I think, a reason for holding it competent.

As an original proposition, I should be inclined to say that the recovery should be the same whether a man is married or single. Conceding the rule to have been established by this court that evidence that the party is married is competent, I would not extend the rule to include evidence as to children. It occurs to me there are reasons for excluding evidence as to children which would not apply to the question whether the party was married. There is but one wife, who is an adult, but there may be many children, some of tender age. But the question as to whether evidence that a person deceased or injured is married is admissible is not the question here, and I shall not discuss it. The only question now is whether it is competent to show the number and ages of children.

I concede that it is proper for a jury to be advised, in a general way, of the situation and condition in life of the party injured, as held in the cited New York case of Perry v. Lansing, 17 Hun, 34, and other cases, but it seems to me the argument in support of the proposition that the evidence as to the number and ages of children is admissible is on the theory that children would be a greater inducement to earn and save. If it is an inducement for greater effort and stricter economy, the effect would be to increase the value of the estate, and, if that is so, the estate would suffer greater damage; therefore the recovery should be larger. I understand the majority to say this is not the purpose, but the reasoning and cases in support of the proposition are, as I think, based upon the theory that it is for that purpose. For instance, it is said that under the Nebraska statute, authorizing a recovery for the injury to support of dependent relatives, such evidence is competent, and that the reasoning of that court in such a case is applicable here. That such evidence is admissible, "not as a direct ground for the jury's action, but as showing what deceased was doing, and likely to do, to make his life pecuniarily valuable to plaintiff." [South Omaha Waterworks Co. v. Vocasek, 62 Neb. 710, 87 N. W. 536, 10 Am. Neg. Rep. 580.] If the fact of having children is likely to make his life pecuniarily valuable, it should enhance the damages; if less valuable, then the damages should be decreased. It would be one way or the other, depending on the character of the children, whether they were a help or otherwise.

I do not say that the evidence is not competent under the Nebraska statute, where damages do not go to the estate, as in Iowa. What I am trying to show is the false position of the majority when they say it is not admitted for the purpose of increasing or decreasing the damages, when it cannot have any other effect, and is not and cannot be admissible for any other purpose. It seems to be the theory under the Nebraska holding that the fact of having children would make the life more valuable, while in at least one Iowa case (Dufree v. Wabash R. Co. 155 Iowa, 544, 136 N. W. 695) the thought seems to be that the life would be less valuable. This is so, or else I do not comprehend the ruling in that case. Here was the situation in that case, as stated in the majority opinion: "The plaintiff having shown the wages earned by the deceased, it was developed on cross-examination that he was saving none of his earnings and had no property. On redirect examination plaintiff was permitted to show that deceased was supporting a wife and three children. The defendant assigned error upon this ruling and cited Beems v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. in support of its position. The authority of that precedent was not discussed by the court, for we held that the evidence was admissible, in any event, as an explanation of the fact that deceased was not making any savings." If he was unable to save anything because of the expense of raising his children, what other effect could it have but to decrease the value of his estate?

It should be kept in mind that this is not a case under the Employers' Liability Act, but is an action for damages to the estate of deceased. In State v. Rutledge, 135 Iowa, 581, 113 N. W. 461, a criminal case, it was held such evidence was not proper, and in it the Beems Case is referred to and approved. In State ex rel. Pitham v. Wangler, 151 Iowa, 555, 132 N. W. 22, a bastardy case, the ruling was the same, and the Beems Case referred to, but it was held that in such a case there was no prejudice, on the theory, no doubt, that the form of the verdict in a bastardy case is guilty or not guilty, and the jury do not have to do with fixing the amount which shall be allowed for the support of the child. But these two cases do not quite reach the point now under consideration. The question first arose in Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391, but was not squarely decided; the court holding that, because the jury were, by the instructions, guarded against allowance of damages for improper causes, there was no prejudice. The court did say: "We would not be understood, however, as determining that evidence as to the number and ages of his children is strictly proper." In Lowe v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 89 Iowa, 420, 433, 56 N. W. 519, decided since the Beems Case, it is stated that it was shown by the evidence, among other things, that deceased left a wife and three children, but the question now being considered was not raised in any manner.

Under statutes which provide that the damages for wrongful death inure to the benefit of the family, such evidence is admissible. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey, 157 U. S. 72, 39 L. ed. 624, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 491. In that case the statute excludes the creditors of deceased from any interest in the recovery, and declares not only that the judgment shall inure exclusively to the benefit of his family, but that the damages shall be assessed with reference to the injury done to the widow and next of kin. This seems to be the distinction running through the cases that, if the damages inure to the benefit of the family, it may be shown what persons compose the family, but not so if the damages go to the estate, as in this case. The question here is: What was the value of the life of the deceased to his estate? The number of his children can have no bearing on that question. The measure of the recovery and the elements to be considered are stated in Grace v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. 153 Iowa, 418, 432, 133 N. W. 672, and Neal v. Sheffield Brick & Tile Co. 151 Iowa, 690, 695, 130 N. W. 398.

The thought in the last sentence of instruction 11½, that evidence as to the children is to be considered on the question of inducement or incentive to habits of industry, etc., is on the theory, doubtless, that, as stated by the minority in the Beems Case, it "would largely add to the value of his personal services to his own estate." The majority opinion in this case says the purpose is "to stimulate him to industry, prudence, and economy." It would seem that, if this be true, the only effect it could have would be to increase the value of his estate, and thus necessarily to increase the damages, so that the last two clauses in instruction 11½ are in conflict and cannot be reconciled.

Some of the cases exclude evidence as to children because its admission is likely to prejudice the jury. It was said by a majority of the court in the Beems Case that observation and experience do not teach that one's income is likely to increase in the same ratio as the number of his children. It would seem that there are other reasons for excluding such evidence. If it is thought that children would be an inducement to habits of industry, and thus increase the value of his estate, how long would the inducement continue? Would it continue during the entire expectancy of the person injured or deceased? Would there be other children born after the injury and after the trial? Would some of these die? What is their expectancy? What are their habits? Would their earnings, until they reach their majority, add to the estate, or would it cost more to raise them than they earn? Suppose a man has six minor children, who are dutiful, in good health, industrious, and saving; they would, when old enough, be a great help and aid to the parent in accumulating and saving money. But suppose the children are sickly, requiring medical expense, they are unable to work, or suppose they are lazy and spendthrifts, would they enhance or decrease the value of the estate? We will say that the parent is injured or killed. If proof as to the number of children is competent, then the man with the family of children who are not helpful obtains the same advantage by such proof as the man whose family is an aid to him, unless all these matters are gone into. Would defendant's attorney dare to cross-examine and show that the children are cripples or sickly? For the purpose of argument, I am assuming at this point that the sympathies of the jury would not be aroused, and that they would fairly consider such evidence for the only purpose for which it could be considered, and that is to either enhance or decrease damages. If it be competent to show the number of children composing the family of the person injured or deceased, why would it not be competent to show that the parents or grandchildren of such person were members of his family, if that be the fact? These and other questions naturally arise. It seems to the writer that these matters are too remote, uncertain, speculative, and would involve the investigation of collateral matters. To hold that such evidence is admissible necessarily overrules the Beems Case and overturns a precedent of thirty years' standing, is against the overwhelming weight of authority, and establishes a dangerous rule.

If the evidence is properly in the record, it would be legitimate to refer to it in argument to the jury; and hereafter, in personal injury and like cases, we may expect it to be used to the best advantage, and in all probability we will be compelled to reverse cases because of it.

Appellee cites Hamann v. Milwaukee Bridge Co. 136 Wis. 39, 116 N. W. 854, and quotes therefrom as follows: "In an action for negligent death, by decedent's widow, suing as administratrix, she can show the state of her health, and the number of her children; the jury being properly cautioned that she could recover only for the pecuniary damage resulting to herself from the death." The opinion is brief on this point. It cites two prior decisions L.R.A.1918C.

of the Wisconsin court, one of which (Lawson v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. 64 Wis. 447, 54 Am. Rep. 634, 24 N. W. 618) cites the Donaldson Case, 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391, as authority; and Abbot v. McCadden, 81 Wis. 563, 29 Am. St. Rep. 970, 51 N. W. 1079, in which the court says: "The court charged the jury, on the subject of damages, that the damages 'must be the money value only to her and her children which the life of the deceased was worth to her and them on the day of his death.' . . . This was error. The fact that there are children left surviving, whose support will be thrown on the plaintiff, is proper to be shown in evidence and to be considered by the jury; but the damages recoverable are those which the widow has suffered, not those which the children have suffered." From this it appears that there is a different statute in Wisconsin from ours by which the damages are for the benefit of the widow, and not the estate.

Appellee also cites as being to the same effect as the Hamann Case the following: 7 Enc. Ev. 439; but an examination of the text shows that this is the rule in states which by statute allow the right of action for the benefit of the next of kin of deceased. He also cites 8 Am. Eng. & Enc. Law, 941. But at page 940 of the same volume the same distinction is made which I make. It is there stated that, where the action is brought by the widow for the death of her husband, the ground of the admissibility of such evidence is that by the death of the father the responsibility of supporting and rearing the children is cast upon the plaintiff, their mother, and it is proper to show the extent and character of this responsibility thus cast upon her. Also 13 Cyc. 358, and numerous cases there cited. The text here refers to the number and condition of persons dependent upon deceased. Some of the cases there cited are under statutes such as I have mentioned. In my opinion the rule announced in the Beems Case as to evidence in regard to children of a deceased person is correct, and it is sustained by the weight of authority. In some of the cases the party injured was deceased, in others he survived; but the rule is the same, for in one case he is suing for his own injuries, and in the other his representative is suing for damages to his estate. As sustaining the rule in the Beems Case, see 13 Cyc. 196, and cases, also Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 480, 26 L. ed. 141, 145; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Camp, 26 C. C. A. 626, 54 U. App. 218, 76 S. W. 231; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Adams, 74 Ark. 326, 109 Am. St. Rep. 85, 85 S. W. 768, 86 S. W. 287; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eakin, 103 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, 46 S. Campbell, 44 Colo. 1, 96 Pac. 986; Standard Oil Co. v. Tierney, 92 Ky. 367, 14 L.R.A. 677, 36 Am. St. Rep. 595, 17 S. W. 1025; Union P. R. Co. v. McMican, 114 C. C. A. 311, 194 Fed. 393. These are not all the cases which might be cited. Many others are cited in some of these. It would unduly extend this dissent to quote at any length from these cases, but I wish to refer to a few of them.

In Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy, 102 U. S. 451, 460, 26 L. ed. 141, 145, a verdict for $10,000 was set aside and the cause reversed solely because of the admission of such evidence.

In the Kansas case (Union P. R. Co. v. Hammerlund, 70 Kan. 888, 79 Pac. 152). It was held that the evidence was not competent, and the court said the question is not debatable.

In the Kentucky case of Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Eakin, 103 Ky. 465, 45 S. W. 529, the court quotes from the opinion in the case of Chicago v. O'Brennan, 65 Ill. 163, as follows: "Was this evidence admissible? If it was, then it would have been competent to have gone further and shown all the circumstances of the family; such as that the mother was an invalid, that one of the daughters was blind, that one son had accidentally lost a leg, etc., if such had been the case, so as to present a most pitiable picture of a helpless family dependent upon appellee for support as a lecturer; for, as the evidence had no place in the case but as a stimulant to the jury, it would have been just as competent to make the stimulant strong as weak. But was it competent at all? It is an elementary rule that evidence must be confined to the points at issue. There was no point in issue to which this evidence had any relevancy. This sort of attempt to foist irrelevant matters L.R.A.1918C.

upon the attention of the jury, with a view to creating a personal interest, is too often the secondary resort of a party on the witness stand." The Kentucky case states that this rule has received the approval of that court in a number of recently decided cases, citing them.

In the case of Jones & A. Co. v. George, 227 Ill. 64, 81 N. E. 4, 10 Ann. Cas. 285, supra, it was said: "On the trial of this case appellee was allowed to prove that he was a married man and had three children. The evidence was objected to, and the objection overruled. The damages recoverable in this case can only be compensatory. The domestic relations, the financial standing . . . of the parties, are therefore irrelevant. . . . Youngblood v. South Carolina R. Co. 85 Am. St. Rep. 835, and note (60 S. C. 9, 38 S. E. 232), where many other authorities are collected. . . . The error in admitting this evidence is virtually admitted by appellee and was recognized by the appellate court, but it was thought that the remittitur of $1,500 ought in some way to cure this error. We cannot assent to this view. Evidence of this character not only tends to enhance the damages, but it is calculated to arouse a sympathy for appellee which is liable to unconsciously influence a jury in the decision of other controverted questions of fact in the appellee's favor. It would be a dangerous precedent to hold that a party might introduce irrelevant testimony which would appeal to the sympathy, passions, or prejudices of a jury in such a way as to insure him the verdict on all doubtful questions of fact, then permit the trial court to estimate how much of a gross sum awarded as damages was due to such irrelevant testimony, and deduct that from the total verdict and render judgment for the balance, and thus cure an error, but for which the verdict might have been in favor of the other party."

Early New York and Alabama cases are cited in the majority opinion. I have not examined them, but the later cases from those states which I cite hold that the evidence is inadmissible.

In my opinion, the evidence as to the number and ages of the children was not admissible in this case for any purpose, and the instruction cannot be sustained because of the conflict therein. I would reverse.

Deemer, J., joins in the dissent.

Annotation—Character and sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss to estate of decedent.

For other notes in this series relative to the admissibility, character, or sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss by negligently killing a person, see note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056, where the different notes presenting different aspects of this matter are referred to at length.

This note presupposes the elements of damages recoverable, and is concerned only with the character or sufficiency of the evidence to prove those elements. It does not, therefore, purport to cover the cases where the admissibility of the offered evidence turns upon the question whether the matter to which it relates is a proper element of damages. This, though in form a question of evidence, is really a question of substantive law, and will be treated in subsequent notes in this series.

Character of evidence—in general.

The majority of the actions to recover for negligently killing a person are based upon statutes authorizing the recovery of compensation for the pecuniary loss to designated surviving relatives of the decedent. In some jurisdictions, however, recovery is permitted in behalf of the estate of the decedent. In that case the damages are computed upon a different principle than they are in cases where the recovery is for the pecuniary loss of designated relatives. As pointed out in the note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056, where it is sought to recover compensation for the pecuniary loss to the estate of the deceased through his death, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show pecuniary loss to the estate. The material question of inquiry is as to the character and sufficiency of the evidence to entitle the plaintiff to recover substantial damages.

Age; health; physical condition; habits; occupation.

Generally, in order to establish pecuniary loss to the estate of the deceased by his death, evidence is admissible to show his age, health at the time of the injury resulting in his death, his weight, height, hearing, habits, occupation, etc.<sup>1</sup> And evidence is also admissible as to

<sup>1</sup> Broughel v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. (1901) 73 Conn. 614, 84 Am. St. Rep. 176, 48 Atl. 751, holding that evidence is admissible to show that the decedent was in good health and in the prime of life.

Di Prisco v. Wilmington City R. Co. (1904) 4 Penn. (Del.) 527, 57 Atl. 906, holding that evidence as to the cheerfulness of the decedent, a boy eight years old, is irrelevant in an action by his personal representative to recover for his death.

Wilcox v. Wilmington City R. Co. (1899) 2 Penn. (Del.) 157, 44 Atl. 686, holding that evidence of the state of health of the decedent at the time of her injury is competent in an action by her personal representative to recover damages to her estate for her wrongful death, and it is also competent to inquire as to her habits of industry, as tending to show a value to her life independently of her duties to her husband.

Van Gent v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 80 Iowa, 526, 45 N. W. 913, holding that evidence is admissible as to the habits of the decedent as to sobriety and industry, and also as to his character as a brakeman.

Simonson v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1878) 49 Iowa, 87, holding that evidence is proper as to the condition of health of the deceased, his aptitude and qualification for business, and his habits of industry.

Donaldson v. Mississippi & M. R. Co. (1864) 18 Iowa, 280, 87 Am. Dec. 391, holding that evidence is admissible relative to the occupation, age, health, habits, earning power, and property of the decedent, where the measure of damages is loss to his estate.

Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Lovell (1910) 141 Ky. 249, 47 L.R.A.(N.S.) 909, 132 S. W. 569, rehearing denied in (1911) 142 Ky. 1, 133 S. W. 788, holding that evidence is admissible concerning the habits, character, physical condition, earning capacity, and probable duration of life of the deceased.

Cox v. Louisville & A. R. Co. (1910) 137 Ky. 388, 125 S. W. 1056, holding that evidence is admissible as to the decedent's earning capacity, size, weight, height, health, hearing, sight, general physique, and education, moral training, and vocation.

Louisville R. Co. v. Will (1902) 23 Ky. L. Rep. 1961, 66 S. W. 628, holding that in an action to recover compensation for the pain and suffering of the deceased, plaintiff is not prejudiced by the admission of evidence as to the earning capacity, age, and condition of health of the deceased.

East Tennessee, V. & G. R. Co. v. Gurley (1883) 12 Lea (Tenn.) 46, holding that where the damages recoverable are for the same elements as the decedent might have recovered for had he survived the injury, it is competent to show his ability and capacity to labor, his skill in his own business or profession, and that the decedent was a man of good, regular, temperate habits.

And see Van Gent v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (Iowa) supra, holding that where it has been shown that the deceased was in-the bad habits of the deceased, for the purpose of decreasing the amount of recovery.<sup>1a</sup>

Earning capacity and property.

It has been held that where the decedent was living upon his income, his earning power may be shown by evidence of his age, health, intelligence, habits, mental and physical capacity to earn and acquire property, and his skill in the management of his property.<sup>2</sup>

And evidence is generally admissible relative to the decedent's earning power<sup>3</sup> and his aptitude and qualifications for business,<sup>4</sup> and also as to the amount of property he was possessed of at the time of his injury and death.<sup>5</sup> But evidence is inadmissible as to the poor pecuniary condition in which he left his family,<sup>6</sup> although it may be shown that he had saved or accumulated no money or property, and his failure in this regard may be explained by evidence that he was supporting a large family.<sup>7</sup>

jured some years prior to the accident resulting in his death, and that some of the bones in one of his shoulders had been removed, it is competent for his brother, who had, since that time, tussled with the decedent, to testify as to the effect this injury had upon the decedent's health and strength after the wound had healed.

Compare with Walter v. Chicago, D. & M. R. Co. (1874) 39 Iowa, 33, holding that evidence is incompetent to show that the decedent, many years prior to his death, lived in a cabin, in filth and wretchedness.

58 Iowa, 150, 12 N. W. 222, holding that evidence as to the number of decedent's family and the amount of property he had accumulated is inadmissible on the question of the value of his life to his estate.

McKelvy v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (Iowa) supra, holding that evidence is admissible to show that the decedent was an industrious, saving, economical man, that he always carefully looked after his business affairs, and that he was a farmer and it is not prejudicial error to receive evidence as to the size of his farm and as to whether or not his property was accumulated since his marriage.

Compare with Dalton v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1897) 104 Iowa, 26, 73 N. W. 349, holding that evidence as to the value of the decedent's interest in a farm is inadmissible in an action by the personal representative to recover for his wrongful death.

Lord v. Manchester Street R. Co. (1907) 74 N. H. 295, 67 Atl. 689, holding that, as bearing upon the decedent's capacity to earn

Evidence of existence of dependents.

The courts do not agree as to whether or not, when the action is for the loss to decedent's estate by his death, evidence is admissible that he was survived by a widow and minor children. Such evidence has been held to be admissible as tending to show an incentive upon the part of the decedent to earn and accumulate property, and also to show his actual earnings where connected with the evidence as to the amount he expended in the support of his family.<sup>8</sup> In other jurisdictions, however, where the action is for the benefit of the estate, evidence has been held to be inadmissible to show that the deceased was survived by a widow and children, although no particular ground for the rejection of this evidence has been pointed out other than its immateriality and the danger that it would improperly affect the damages recoverable.<sup>9</sup>

It has been held that where the measure of damages to the estate of the deceased for his death depends upon whether or not the deceased in his lifetime consumed his wages in the support of his family, and hence was accumulating nothing, as a circumstance aiding in the solution of the question it is competent to show how many and who were dependent upon the deceased, and what, if anything, they were earning.<sup>10</sup>

Action for death of infant.

Although for the death of a child the amount of damages recoverable under the Survival Act cannot be estimated with certainty either as to the element of pain and suffering or future earnings after the age of twenty-one, yet this fact does not deprive the personal representative of the injured person of all damages. The fact that the child's death occurred before he became a wage earner does not foreclose inquiry as to the probable value of his services for the years ensuing his death, after he would have arrived at his majority. To enable the jury to determine the probable earning capacity of a child for the period of his probable life after arriving at the age of twenty-one, a wide latitude is allowed in the admission of testimony in reference to the child's status and future prospects, and the vocations and their remuneration which might reasonably be expected to be open to him.<sup>11</sup> As bearing money, evidence is admissible as to what work she habitually did, including what she did in the way of caring for her children; and in this connection their ages and number may be shown.

W. 872, holding that the measure of damages to a personal representative for the death of his decedent is such a sum as will compensate the estate for the destruction of the decedent's earning power; hence evidence is inadmissible as to the number of children dependent upon the deceased.

on the vocation that the deceased, a boy twelve years of age, might have followed had he lived, it has been held that evidence is admissible as to the occupation followed by his father.<sup>12</sup>

Sufficiency of evidence — in general.

While there should be some evidence as to the amount of damages suffered by the estate of the decedent through his death other than the mere fact that he died, and his age at that time, it is sufficient in this regard to show the size of the decedent, his physical and mental condition, and that he lived some moments after the injury and suffered some pain.<sup>13</sup> Evidence of the age of the decedent and his occupation, and that he left a small property and was a man of industrious habits, although not in perfect health, is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover a substantial amount for damage to decedent's estate.<sup>14</sup> Where the damages recoverable are for the same elements as those for which decedent might have recovered had he survived the injury, it is sufficient to show his ability and capacity to labor and his skill in his business or profession, and that he was a man of good, regular, and temperate habits.<sup>15</sup> Even evidence as to the age of the deceased and as to his ability to get around and do light work will support a judgment for substantial damages.<sup>16</sup> And in order to recover for the expense of a physician attending the deceased, it is not necessary to show that his bill has been paid.<sup>17</sup> But it has been held that to entitle the plaintiff in an action to recover for wrongful death to have included in his damages the amount paid for medical and surgical attendance and the funeral expenses of the decedent, it must appear that the claims for these items have been presented and allowed against his estate.<sup>18</sup>

As to pain and suffering.

In order to show pain and suffering by the deceased from the injury which resulted in his death, evidence is admissible of complaints by him of pain and suffering, where they do not refer to a past condition.<sup>19</sup> And testimony is admissible by the physician who examined the body of the deceased immediately after death had ensued, that, in his opinion, the deceased was conscious for a substantial period of time after his injury and before his death, during which he suffered.<sup>20</sup> While evidence is admissible as to the decedent's sufferings, evidence of mental anguish and suffering by his relatives is inadmissible.<sup>21</sup> And where the measure of damages is limited to compensation for the destruction of the decedent's earning power, evidence is inadmissible as to Iowa, 558, 84 N. W. 758, declaring that the rule permitting the recovery only of nominal damages for the death of a young girl was abhorrent to all civilized ideas of right and justice. It is said that it is not an easy matter correctly to estimate the probable earnings and savings even of those whose life work has already been chosen, and it is still more difficult to determine the question where it relates to an infant. The most that can be done is to place before the jury such facts as shall support proper and legitimate inferences, and leave them to the determination of the matter with the assistance of the knowledge and observation common to all alike.

his sufferings.<sup>22</sup> So where an injured person brings an action in his lifetime to recover damages for personal injuries, and dies from the injuries during the pendency of the action, upon prosecution of the action after it has been revived by the personal representative, the death of the decedent cannot be shown in aggravation of damages.<sup>23</sup> The admissibility of evidence as to pain and suffering, however, is not discussed where it depends upon the substantive question whether or not that is a proper element of damages.

W. B. ANDERSON, Admr., etc., of Walter M. Richardson, Deceased.

(134 Tenn. 666, 185 S. W. 677.)

Limitation of actions — change of plaintiff — effect.

1. The substitution of the administrator for the widow in an action for wrongful death is not a change of cause of action within the operation of the Statute of Limitations.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, IV. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — change from state to Federal statutes.

2. The change of the basis of a cause of action for wrongful death from a state statute to the Federal Employers' Liability Act, and the insertion of allegations that decedent was employed in interstate commerce, are not a beginning of a new action within the operation of the Statute of Limitations; at least, if the interstate character of the transaction was made to appear by the pleadings before the statute had run.

For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, IV. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Appeal — instruction — recovery without evidence.

4. Instructing the jury to find for plaintiff if the greater weight of evidence is on the side of his declaration is error, if some allegations of the declaration are unsupported by evidence.

Damages — for wrongful death — pecuniary loss.

5. The damages to be awarded a widow and child for the wrongful death of the husband and father, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, is an amount sufficient to compensate them for the loss of such portions of his earnings as they might reasonably have expected to receive.

For other cases, see Damages, III. i, 3, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — of loss from death.

6. To sustain a verdict in favor of a widow and child for the wrongful death of the husband and father, under the Federal Employers' Liability Act, there must be evidence as to the value of his customary contributions towards their support.

CROSS WRITS of Certiorari to review a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals reversing a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in plaintiff's favor in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged wrongful death of plaintiff's decedent; plaintiff seeking review of the finding that the cause of action was barred by the Statute of Limitations, and the defendant seeking review of the failure to find that there was no evidence to sustain the verdict. Reversed on plaintiff's writ.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. W. H. Washington, for plaintiff:

The cause of action was the facts constituting the negligence of the company. The amendment stating that those facts occurred in interstate commerce, and the interstate character of defendant's business, and of the train upon which deceased was employed, did not state a new cause of action.

Rep. 305, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159, 9 N. C. C. A. 109.

Green, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

W. M. Richardson, an employee of the plaintiff in error, was killed while in its service in the Atlanta yards June 9, 1908.

On June 23, 1908, W. B. Anderson, who had qualified as administrator of the deceased, brought suit for his death in the circuit court of Davidson county, Tennessee. The deceased left a widow and an infant child.

The declaration as originally filed was founded on the Georgia statutes regulating the right of recovery for wrongful death. It was alleged in the declaration that the deceased was an inexperienced employee put to do dangerous work without any training or instruction, and it was further alleged that the car on which he was riding when killed was being moved at an excessive rate of speed, and that said car was not equipped with proper brakes. The deceased was engaged as a switchman when killed, and was thrown from a car by the force of a coupling made with another car. In the declaration and amendments thereto a number of sections of the Georgia Code supposed to control this suit were set out.

Various pleas were interposed by the railway company, to all of which it is not necessary to refer.

As stated above, the suit was originally brought in the name of W. B. Anderson, administrator of the deceased, but later, it appearing that under the Georgia statutes the widow was the proper person to bring the suit, she was made a party plaintiff, and an order was entered which, in effect, dismissed the case as to the administrator, Anderson, and directed that the suit be prosecuted in the name of Mary E. Richardson, the widow, by next friend, she being under age.

Among other pleas filed by the railway company was one setting out that it was a common carrier engaged in interstate commerce, and that the deceased was a servant employed in operating a car engaged in interstate commerce when he met his death.

A demurrer was interposed to this plea.

which was sustained by the circuit judge, the scope and effect of the Federal statute with reference to interstate employees not being at that time fully appreciated by the bench and bar, and the court thinking the plea injected an immaterial issue.

The case proceeded to trial, and a judgment was had in favor of the plaintiff. The railway company took the case to the court of civil appeals, and that court reversed the judgment below and remanded the case on account of the error of the trial judge in sustaining the demurrer to the railway company's plea setting out the interstate character of the service of deceased.

When the case was remanded a stipulation was entered into between counsel to the effect that the car from which deceased fell was then being used in interstate commerce, and that the deceased was employed in interstate commerce at that time.

Amendments were offered by which W. B. Anderson, administrator, was again made the party plaintiff instead of the widow, and by which all reference to the Georgia statutes was eliminated from the declaration, and an averment incorporated into the declaration that deceased was engaged in the service of the railway company in interstate commerce at the time of the accident. These amendments were resisted by the railway company on the ground that such procedure was, in effect, the bringing of a new suit, and at the time such amendments were made more than two years had elapsed since the death of Richardson. These objections of the railway company were overruled by the trial judge, and the case again proceeded to judgment. The railway company again appealed in error to the court of civil appeals.

A number of assignments of error were interposed by the railway company in the court of civil appeals. That court was of opinion that the amendments to the former declaration, or rather the amended declaration, eliminating reference to the Georgia statute, and undertaking to proceed under the act of Congress in the name of the administrator, was a change of the cause of action and substantially a new suit. The court of civil appeals held that such new suit was barred by the two-year limitation prescribed in the act of Congress, and accordingly that court concluded that the trial judge improperly overruled the motion of the railway company for a directed verdict. That court passed on other assignments of error interposed by the railway company, and held that three of these assignments were well made, and that the case, upon these three assignments, would have been reversed, if the motion for per-L.R.A.1918C.

A petition for certiorari was filed by the administrator of the deceased to review the action of the court of civil appeals upon the matters just mentioned. The railway company likewise filed a petition for certiorari in which it is maintained that, regardless of the bar of the statute of two years, there is no evidence to sustain the verdict below, and the railway company accordingly insists that its motion for a directed verdict was good on this additional ground.

Both of these petitions for certiorari have been granted, and the case has been argued and fully considered.

We are of opinion that the court of civil appeals erred in holding this suit was barred by the two-year period of limitations prescribed in the act of Congress.

So far as the change from the widow as a party plaintiff to the administrator as a party plaintiff is concerned, such a change is not a change of the cause of action. Likewise, the reference made in the original pleadings of the widow to the Georgia statute may be disregarded as surplusage and of no effect. These propositions have been established by the Supreme Court in the case of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf, 226 U. S. 570, 57 L. ed. 355, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 135, Ann. Cas. 1914B, 134.

That case is quite recent and is familiar to the profession, and a bare reference thereto in this opinion is all that is necessary. Suit was brought by the mother of an employee killed in interstate commerce, and was apparently founded on the Kansas statute. Later there was an amendment to the proceeding by which the administrator of deceased was introduced as party plaintiff. This amendment came more than two years after the death of the employee, and an inspection of this case discloses that practically the same argument was made in behalf of the railroad company there which is here made in behalf of the plaintiff in error.

The Supreme Court, however, held that there was no change of the cause of action, that the reference to the Kansas statute "no more vitiated the pleading than a reference to any other repealed statute would have done," and the court distinguished Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler, 158 U. S. 285, 39 L. ed. 983, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 877, also relied on by the plaintiff in error here.

It must be conceded that Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf, supra, destroys much of the argument made in behalf of plaintiff in error. Certainly this case establishes the proposition that such a change of parties—that is, from the beneficiary to the representative of the beneficiary—is no change in the cause of action. This case, however, differs from Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf in that plaintiff's pleading in the former case showed that the deceased servant was employed in interstate commerce when injured, while nothing of this kind appears in the original pleadings filed by the widow in this case. It is therefore insisted that the amendment to the declaration showing the deceased to have been employed in interstate commerce at the time of his death stated a new cause of action. Here again Union P. R. Co. v. Wyler is invoked, and it is insisted that this amendment showing the interstate character of the service of deceased is, in effect, a departure from fact to fact and from law to law, and is therefore a new suit.

We think it obvious under the reasoning of Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf that there was no departure from law to law. The Federal statute repealed the Georgia statute. The Georgia statute was ineffective for any purpose, and the reference to it did not help or hurt the declaration, unless, indeed, the deceased was engaged in intrastate commerce. That deceased was not engaged in intrastate commerce, but interstate commerce, was fully made to appear by the aforesaid plea interposed to the declaration by the defendant below, and we agree with counsel for the administrator that this plea of the railway company supplied the omission in the declaration and made the interstate character of deceased's service obvious in the pleadings. No issue was ever made on the facts alleged in said plea.

This plea of the railway company was filed seven months after the accident occurred. The declaration stated acts of negligence cognizable under the Federal Employers' Liability Statute. The only point of the plea was that the suit was not brought in the name of the administrator. The suit was not barred at that time. The Georgia statute had been repealed as to employees engaged in interstate service, and the declaration stated a good cause of action under the act of Congress, except that it failed to aver the interstate character of deceased's service. This was admitted by the plea. The sole effect of the special plea referred to was to bar the prosecution of the suit in the name of the widow. This plea set out, as a fact, that deceased was employed in interstate commerce at the time of his death, and challenged the suit in the name of the widow. The plea would not have been good unless such fact had been made to appear. Such fact having been admitted by the demurrer, and the railway company having obtained the benefit of this admission, and having procured a reversal of the former judgment against it on the strength of the plea, it would be inadmissible at this time to hold that the interstate nature of deceased's employment was not sufficiently brought out in the pleadings prior to the running of the two-year statute.

This court long ago announced the rule that matters of substance omitted from a declaration might be cured by a plea.

In Harmon v. Crook, 2 Yerg. 127, the defendant had entered into a covenant to convey certain land if the plaintiff liked it or desired it. The declaration should have averred that the covenantee had notified the covenantor of his desire for the land or of his willingness to accept a conveyance thereof. No such averment, however, was contained in the declaration. The defendant in his plea, instead of making any point of the absence of this averment, stated that he had offered to make the conveyance. It was held that such a plea cured the omission in the demurrer. The court said: "The plea says that the defendants offered to convey these two tracts: hence is inferred an admission on their part that they were bound to do so, which obligation could not otherwise be fixed upon them but by a previous notice given to them by the plaintiff that he was willing to accept of the same two tracts. The plaintiff complains that they did not convey these two tracts, which they were not bound to convey unless by his previous consent to accept them, made known to the covenantors. But the plaintiff and the covenantors agree in the fact that the defendant ought to have conveyed these two tracts. The pleadings, it is argued, show upon their face, when taken altogether, that the fact of notice to the covenantors is sufficiently apparent, though not stated in the declaration. The old rule was that matters of form, such as time, place, and circumstances, which might be taken advantage of by special demurrer, can be cured by the plea of the defendant, but that matters of substance, which can be taken advantage of by general demurrer, cannot be cured by the plea of the defendant. [Citing authorities.] But certainly it has often been extended so as to cure the omission of matters of substance, which must have been taken advantage of on general demurrer. Matters of substance are cured by pleading over. [Citing authorities.] And not only material things imperfectly alleged have been cured, but also material things not alleged at all. [Citing authorities.] The willingness of the plaintiff to take the tracts of 100 and of 52 acres is so plainly apparent upon the record that there seems to be no risk in making the inference that it was so understood both by the covenants and covenantee, and that therefore the want of notice alleged in the declaration is cured by the pleas of the defendants." Harmon v. Crook, supra.

This rule has been expressly approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in United States v. Morris, 10 Wheat. 246, 6 L. ed. 314. In that case the Supreme Court held that a defective plea might be aided by a replication just as a defective declaration might be aided by a plea. The court said: "And this rule is not confined to matters of form merely, but extends to matters of substance. Thus, in an action of trespass for taking goods, not stating them to be the property of the plaintiff, this defect will be aided if the defendant by his plea admits the plaintiff's property. So, where several acts are to be performed by the plaintiff as a condition precedent, and he does not aver performance of all, if it appear by the plea that the act omitted to be stated was, in fact, performed, the defect is cured." United States v. Morris, supra.

"If a necessary allegation is omitted from a pleading, and the missing allegation is either alleged or admitted by the pleading of the adverse party, the defect is cured." 31 Cyc. 714.

Many authorities to the same effect are cited in 16 Enc. Pl. & Pr. 580. Although the decisions are not altogether uniform on this question, it certainly appears that this court and the Supreme Court of the United States are committed to the rule that material allegations omitted in a declaration may be supplied by a plea.

Aside, however, from the rule just announced, it is manifest from reading the opinions of the Supreme Court in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Wulf, supra, and in St. Louis, S. F. & T. R. Co. v. Seale, 229 U. S. 156, 57 L. ed. 1129, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 651, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 156, that the court is committed to a liberal policy with respect to allowing amendments which will save for injured employees and their beneficiaries the rights conferred upon them by the act of Congress.

In the latter case the Supreme Court reversed and dismissed a suit prosecuted without an administrator, but the dismissal was made without prejudice to any rights the administrator might have. The court would not have done a vain thing. This dismissal without prejudice would scarcely have been ordered unless it was in contemplation that the suit might be again prosecuted in the name of the administrator, although naturally more than two years must have elapsed since the inception of the action.

The Kentucky court of appeals, referring to the cases decided by the United States Supreme Court, observed: "On the authority of these cases, we think it is clear that, when the cause of action arises under the Federal statute, but suit is brought under the state law, or by some person not authorized to maintain an action under the Federal statute, defects in the original petition may be cured by an amendment that does not set up a new and distinct cause of action, filed after the expiration of two years from the accrual of the cause of action, as the amendment will relate back to the filing of the original petition." Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. R. Co. v. Goode, 163 Ky. 60, 173 S. W. 329.

A like conclusion was reached by the United States circuit court of appeals for the fourth district; that court holding that an amendment to the pleadings might be made after the expiration of two years, alleging that defendant was engaged in interstate commerce, and that plaintiff was employed in such commerce at the time of his injury. Smith v. Atlantic Coast Line R. Co. 127 C. C. A. 311, 210 Fed. 761.

In the last edition of his work on the Federal Employers' Liability Act (p. 308), Mr. Thornton refers to the above cases, and concludes that "an amendment after the two-years limitation by adding formal allegations to bring the case under the Federal act is permissible; the allegations concerning the injury remaining the same. In such an instance no new cause of action has been brought by adding the amendment or changing the complaint."

So, without further elaboration, we hold that the court of civil appeals improperly sustained that branch of the motion for peremptory instructions interposing the bar of the two-year statute.

Apart from the effect of the statute of two years, the court of civil appeals thought that the motion for peremptory instructions was not well made. The court found material evidence in the record to sustain the verdict of the jury. This action of the court of civil appeals is attacked by the railway company. We have discussed the facts orally, and are of opinion that the court of civil appeals was correct in its conclusion. We think there is evidence to sustain the judgment below.

The court of civil appeals thought the case should be reversed on account of the manner in which the trial judge delivered his charge. Instead of stating the issues of fact to the jury, the circuit judge read a portion of the declaration of the plaintiff below, and directed the jury to find in favor of the plaintiff if the greater weight of the evidence was on that side on any one or more of the five counts. This was error. Certain of the averments of negligence were not supported by the proof. In fact, no proof was offered as to some of the matters charged, particularly on the question of defective brakes; yet the circuit judge submitted this question to the jury along with others. This, of course, was improper, and, moreover, it is not desirable for the trial judge to read the pleadings to the jury, but rather to give them a succinct statement of the issues with proper instructions as to the law.

The court of civil appeals sustained the third assignment of plaintiff in error in that court, directed to a special request which the circuit judge gave in charge. It is insisted for the company that there was no evidence upon which such a request might have been predicated. We do not agree with the railway company in this contention. We think there was such evidence in the record, and we see no error in the requested instruction given. It results that the action of the court of civil appeals in this respect is reversed.

The court of civil appeals likewise sustained the assignment of error which challenged the propriety of the court's instruction on the measure of damages under the Federal Employers' Liability Act. We think the court of civil appeals was correct in this action. For this error there must be a new trial.

This suit arose under the Act of April 22, 1908 (35 Stat. at L. chap. 149, p. 65), and before the amendment of April 5, 1910 (36 Stat. at L. chap. 143, § 2, p. 291, Comp. Stat. 1916, §§ 8657-8665).

The beneficiaries in this suit are the widow and minor child of the deceased. They were both entitled to support from the deceased. Their damages would therefore have first included such sum as the widow might reasonably have expected to receive from her husband for support, and such a sum as the child might reasonably have expected to receive from his father for support during minority.

In addition to this the Supreme Court of the United States, in Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, 227 U. S. 59, 57 L. ed. 417, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 192, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 176, after explaining that the beneficiaries can only recover pecuniary damages, has said: "Nevertheless, the word as judicially adopted is not so narrow as to exclude damages for the loss of services of the husband, wife, or child, and, when the beneficiary is a child, for the loss of that care, counsel, training, and education which it might, under the evidence, have reasonably received from the parent, and which can only be supplied by the service of another for compensation."

The circuit judge gave the above-quoted extract in his charge, except that he omitted the phrase "under the evidence," which is all-important.

Likewise, in the concluding portion of his charge, the trial judge told the jury that the damages were to be determined upon a consideration of deceased's expectancy of life, etc., and his earnings, and that, taking these things into consideration, they should assess such damages as might be sufficient to compensate for the pecuniary loss of the widow and child.

If it was meant by his Honor to tell the jury that they might find as damages for these beneficiaries a sum equal to the entire amount of the probable earnings of deceased, in the absence of any proof as to what portion of said earnings the beneficiaries might reasonably have expected to receive, this was plain error. It would have been error to have instructed the jury, under such circumstances, that they might find the damages to be the net value of the earnings of deceased after payment of his personal expenses. Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Leslie, 238 U. S. 599, 59 L. ed. 1478, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 844. The pecuniary loss of these beneficiaries was not what the deceased might have earned, but what part of his earnings they might reasonably have expected to receive.

Furthermore, it seems very clear from a study of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States—namely, Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, supra; American R. Co. v. Didricksen, 227 U. S. 145, 57 L. ed. 456, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 224; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. McGinnis, 228 U. S. 173, 57 L. ed. 785, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 426, 3 N. C. A. 806; North Carolina R. Co. v. Zachary, 232 U. S. 248, 58 L. ed. 591, 34 Sup. Ct. Rep. 305, Ann. Cas. 1914C, 159, 9 N. C. C. A. 109; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Craft, 237 U. S. 648, 59 L. ed. 1160, 33 Sup. Ct. Rep. 704, 9 N. C. C. A. 754; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Holbrook, 235 U. S. 625, 59 L. ed. 392, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143, 7 N. C. C. A. 814; and Kansas City Southern R. Co. v. Leslie, 238 U. S. 599, 59 L. ed. 1478, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 844—that there must be evidence of pecuniary damage before such damage can be allowed. This rule is enforced with more strictness by the Supreme Court of the United States, perhaps, than by some of the state courts in jurisdictions where acts fashioned after Lord Campbell's Act prevail.

In this case deceased's age, expectancy, and earning capacity were proven. It was also proven that his wife and child were dependent upon him for support.

There was no proof, however, as to the value of his customary contributions to the support of these beneficiaries, and nothing to indicate what such beneficiaries might reasonably have expected from him in the way of support. There was no proof of any service, pecuniarily determinable, as defined in Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, which deceased had rendered or might reasonably be expected to render to his wife. There was no proof as to the personal qualities of the deceased and the interest which he took in his family, and therefore no occasion to charge the jury that they might take into consideration the care, counsel, training, and education which the child might reasonably have expected from his father. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Holbrook, 235 U. S. 625, 59 L. ed. 392, 35 Sup. Ct. Rep. 143, 7 N. C. C. A. 814.

It was therefore improper for the trial judge to have submitted such matters to the jury in the absence of any evidence.

The measure of damages of the wife and child was the probable amounts they would have received from the deceased if he had lived, and not his probable earnings. Thornton, Fed. Employers' Liability Act, 3d ed. p. 246.

The measure of the damages of these beneficiaries was the amount which the deceased would probably have earned during his life for their benefit, taking into consideration his age, ability, and disposition to work and habits of life and expectancy. Tiffany, Death by Wrongful Act, 2d ed. § 160.

It is further complained with reference to the charge that the jury were not instructed to consider in any way the expectancy of the wife, but it was assumed she would live as long as her husband would have lived had he not been injured.

We think this complaint is well made. Mr. Tiffany says: "The damages to the widow should be calculated upon the basis of their joint lives; the damages to the minor children for the loss of support should be confined to their minority." Tif- fany, Death by Wrongful Act, 2d ed. § 160.

Mr. Tiffany's discussion of the measure of damages has been approved in two or three cases by the Supreme Court of the United States. He discusses Lord Campbell's Act and similar acts upon which the act of Congress is modeled.

In this case it was only shown that the beneficiaries of this suit had sustained a loss. There was no proof as to the extent of the loss. There was proof of the earning capacity of deceased and his expectancy, but there was nothing to show that these beneficiaries might reasonably have expected to receive from the deceased, and, under such circumstances, under the rules laid down in the late Supreme Court cases, no recovery for more than nominal damages could stand.

The elements of damage to be considered by the jury are indicated in the foregoing authorities. There must be proof to show the reasonable expectation. Under the reasoning of the Supreme Court decisions, the widow's expectancy of life should be taken into account in estimating her loss. Likewise, as plainly intimated in Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Holbrook, supra, the estimate of the child's pecuniary loss should be confined to the period of his minority, both for support and other elements of damage.

As indicated in Michigan C. R. Co. v. Vreeland, supra, cases may arise in which more latitude would be permitted in measuring damages recoverable under this statute. There is nothing exceptional, however in the case before us, and it is better for all parties that this court confine the pecuniary loss to be estimated herein within limits certainly included by the act, as construed by the Supreme Court.

We find it necessary again to point out that there should, in suits founded on this act, be pleadings averring the pecuniary losses which plaintiffs expect to prove.

Reversed and remanded for another trial, with special reference to the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States cited in this opinion.

This note is one of a series of notes in which are considered questions relative to the character and sufficiency of the evidence to show pecuniary loss, under statutes authorizing the recovery of damages as compensation for the pecuniary loss to the estate of the decedent or to designated relatives, for negligently or wantonly killing a person. For a reference to the other notes in this series, see the note appended to Raines v. Southern R. Co. ante, 1056.

It is to be noted that the scope of this note is limited to cases considering the character and sufficiency of evidence to show pecuniary loss, and it does not include cases in which the real question presented was the substantive one as to whether certain elements of loss might be included in the damages recoverable. In other words, in the cases included in this note it is either expressly held or assumed that the damages may include the element involved, and the question is presented as to the character and sufficiency of the proof to establish the same.

I. Character of evidence admissible.

a. In general.

Actions for negligently killing a person are statutory. By the terms of the statute they are generally authorized to be brought in behalf of designated relatives of the deceased, and damages are authorized to be recovered for the pecuniary loss of such persons. Hence the pecuniary loss of such statutory beneficiaries is the measure of the recovery by or for them. As pointed out in another note in this series, the burden of proof is upon the plaintiff in actions of this character to show pecuniary loss in order to be entitled to recover substantial damages for the death complained of.<sup>1</sup> The evidence essential to show pecuniary loss to the statutory beneficiaries, from the nature of the circumstances, must be indefinite, prospective, and largely contingent. Such damages cannot be proven with any degree of accuracy; at the most it is largely a matter for the sound judgment and discretion of the jury based upon their knowledge, experience, and observation. However, there must be some evidence which will afford a reasonable basis for an estimate by the jury. The matter cannot be left entirely to conjecture, for human lives are not all of the same value to the survivors, and even though the evidence may be vague and indefinite, yet there must be evidence with regard to the deceased and his relation to the statutory beneficiaries which will enable the jury to act intelligently in estimating the pecuniary loss suffered by the beneficiaries.<sup>2</sup>

It has been asserted that, while the law does not intend to give compensation for anything but pecuniary loss, by estimating the money value of the life of the relative, and while it necessarily results that regard must in each instance be paid to such facts and conditions as cast light upon the subject, yet it must be admitted that the inquiry is not to be narrowed down by law to a result that can be exactly accounted for by the facts in evidence, for every parent and husband has for his wife and children a pecuniary value beyond the amount of his earnings by his labor or vocation; that value may to some extent, but not to every extent, be susceptible of allegation and proof, and to the extent that it can be alleged and proved it ought to be. But where no amount is fixed by law, and no rule is prescribed for making the calculation upon facts capable of exact ascertainment, it necessarily follows that the law intended that, having reference as far as practicable to the conditions existing at the time of the death, the jurors, from their own experience and sense of justice, should fix and assess the proper sum. They are expected to act uninfluenced by passion, prejudice, or partiality, and to pay due regard to the ascertained facts and conditions surrounding the subject.<sup>3</sup> Very slight evidence of pecuniary loss is sufficient, however, to warrant the submission of the case to the jury, and if they are satisfied that pecuniary injuries resulted, they are at liberty within the statutory limitation to fix the compensation therefor according to their sense of justice and right.<sup>4</sup>

As a rule any facts tending to show pecuniary loss to the beneficiaries, if competent, are admissible in evidence without reference to whether they tend to increase or diminish the amount recovered.<sup>5</sup> It is not, however, essential to prove the pecuniary loss by direct evidence,<sup>6</sup> or by the estimates of witnesses. Indeed, ordinarily, the latter character of evidence is inadmissible.<sup>7</sup> It is sufficient in this regard to produce evidence as to the deceased and the beneficiaries and their relations to each other which will inform the jury as to the situation and condition of the parties at the time of the decedent's death. It is the purpose of the present note to take up more in detail the different questions as to the character and sufficiency of the evidence in these regards.

b. Data as to decedent and beneficiaries.

1. In general.

As pointed out in another note in this series, there is a presumption of pecuniary loss to persons of a designated relationship by the destruction of the life of a relative.<sup>8</sup> For example, such presumption exists in favor of the widow and children, the parents of minor children, and in some jurisdiction the husband. This presumption does not affect the character of the evidence admissible to show pecuniary loss, although it may affect the question as to the necessity of producing evidence along certain lines,—a question which will be subsequently considered. Without reference to the relation existing between the statutory beneficiaries and the decedent, evidence is admissible as to the age and life expectancy of the deceased,<sup>9</sup>

And see Ruppel v. United R. Co. (1905) 1 Cal. App. 666, 82 Pac. 1073, holding the amount of recovery for wrongful death is limited to the value of the pecuniary interest of the statutory beneficiary, but such interest need not be measured and demonstrated as a precise sum of money. For example, the mere failure to show that the decedent at the time of the injury resulting in his death was in sound health and in receipt of full wages or salary, is not fatal to a recovery of more than nominal damages, in behalf of his widow.

from a person's death to the wife and next of kin, it is not necessary to prove actual pecuniary loss; generally the attempt to do so would substitute the opinions of witnesses for the conclusions of the jury. It is sufficient if the facts proved will enable the jury to decide on the proper measure of responsibility.

Frank v. Otis (1888) 15 N. Y. S. R. 681, holding that, for the purpose of determining the pecuniary loss sustained by the next of kin, evidence is competent as to the character, qualities, capacity, and condition of the deceased, and the age, sex, circumstances, and financial condition of the next of kin, following *Lockwood v. The appearance of the widow of the deceased before the jury in an action to recover damages for the death of her husband is sufficient to enable them to judge as to her probable life expectancy. Warren & O. Valley R. Co. v. Waldrop (1909) 93 Ark. 127, 123 S. W. 792.

See Alabama Steel & Wire Co. v. Griffin (1907) 149 Ala. 423, 42 So. 1034, holding that evidence is inadmissible as to the life expectancy of the parents of the deceased in an action for his death, although they are entitled to the amount recovered. The measure of damages in this case, however, was the value of the life of the decedent.

<sup>17</sup> Hunt v. Conner (1901) 26 Ind. App. 41, 59 N. Meng v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank (1915) 169 App. Div. 27, 154 N. Y. Supp. 509, holding that evidence is admissible as to decedent's age, occupation, salary, life expectancy, and as to the expensiveness of the manner and habit of his family life and living.

Palmer v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1887) 26 N. Y. Week. Dig. 26, holding that it is competent to show the relations existing between the plaintiff and decedent, the manner in which the latter lived, the support he furnished his family, his age, health, condition, and ability to earn money and increase his capacity, and thereby benefit his next of kin.

Compare with Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Simms (1892) 43 Ill. App. 260, holding, where the measure of damages for the wrongful death was just compensation for the loss of means of support to the decedent's family, which he might have provided had he lived, evidence of the cost of supporting the decedent's family was inadmissible, since the damages recoverable were not necessarily the entire expense of supporting the family, but were to be based upon the amount the decedent would have contributed to that end had he lived.

3. Habits, character, and reputation.

As heretofore pointed out, evidence is admissible as to the general habits and character of the deceased.<sup>25</sup> In this regard inquiries may be made into his habits for economy,<sup>26</sup> industry,<sup>25</sup> and sobriety,<sup>26</sup> and it has been held that it of his decedent, as bearing upon the damages to be awarded, it is competent to show that the decedent was saving his earnings with a view to acquiring a home.

Central of Georgia R. Co. v. Alexander (1905) 144 Ala. 257, 40 So. 424, holding that the measure of damages recoverable by the administrator is the pecuniary injury sustained by the persons to whose benefit the recovery inures, and for the purpose of ascertaining the probable pecuniary injury it is proper to inquire into the habits of economy of the decedent, the disposition he made of his earnings, etc., in order to ascertain whether he would have accumulated anything so that the distributees of his estate, when he died, would be likely to realize something out of his estate; for if he spent all his earnings on himself or on other objects than the support of the said distributees, the measure of recovery would be nominal under the Employers' Liability Act. Whether he spent a part of these in such ways and saved a part would be a material inquiry in ascertaining the actual damages.

But see Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. State (1895) 81 Md. 371, 32 Atl. 201, holding that, in an action to recover the pecuniary loss to the wife and children of the decedent by his wrongful death, evidence is inadmissible as to whether or not the decedent saved anything from his earnings.

ceased.<sup>31</sup> On the other hand, evidence is admissible as to the bad character and habits of the deceased.<sup>32</sup> In this connection it may be shown that he was in the habit of becoming intoxicated,<sup>33</sup> or that he was not industrious.<sup>34</sup> Evidence, however, is not admissible as to specific acts of wrongdoing on the part of deceased,<sup>35</sup> although, in mitigation of exemplary damages, evidence is admissible covery is compensation for the injury to the deceased.<sup>43</sup>

5. Relationship and feeling between decedent and beneficiaries.

Evidence is admissible on the part of the defendant that the person claiming to be the widow of the deceased was not in fact his wife.<sup>44</sup> And it may be shown that the widow was not entitled to or would not receive support from the decedent. And evidence is admissible as to their marital and domestic relations,<sup>44</sup> at least to the extent of showing that the parties were not living together at the time of his injury or death, or for the purpose of showing the discontinuance of the marital relation. But evidence of divorce proceedings between the decedent and his wife during his lifetime is inadmissible except for these purposes.<sup>45</sup> Nor is evidence admissible as to the character or reputation of the widow.<sup>46</sup> And by the weight of authority it cannot be shown that the surviving husband or wife has remarried or is ento the extent of her ability, the mother succeeded to this natural obligation. And see Thompson v. Johnston Bros. Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 576, 57 N. W. 298, holding, in an action by the widow to recover for the death of a son, evidence is admissible in her behalf as to the number of children she has living, and the amount of mortgage and taxes due upon her property.

<sup>43</sup> In Wood v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. (1910) 1 Boyce (Del.) 336, 76 Atl. 613, it is held that, where the widow, in suing for the death of her husband, limits her recovery to loss of the support which she was receiving or was entitled to receive at the time he was killed, the fact that the parties had an infant child which survived the death of its father is not to be considered by the jury as bearing upon the amount of damages to be awarded.

Compare with St. Louis, P. & N. R. Co. v. Rawley (1900) 90 Ill. App. 663, holding that, in an action by the widow as personal representative, to recover damages for the death of her husband, it is error to receive evidence that the husband supported his wife and children during his lifetime, followed by evidence in detail as to the ages and sex of the children.

App. 57, holding that, although it was improper for the widow of the deceased to testify as to the number and ages of her children surviving their deceased father, yet it was not reversible error where she did not testify that they were dependent upon the deceased for support and that he supported them, and where the jury were correctly instructed as to the measure of damages.

W. 186, holding that, where recovery for wrongful death is limited to the actual pecuniary loss of the statutory beneficiaries, in a suit by a person claiming as the wife of the decedent, it is competent to show that the plaintiff is not decedent's lawful wife, and that he had a lawful wife then living and children by such wife.

<sup>45</sup> Wood v. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. (Del.) supra, holding that the docket entries or the record of the incomplete divorce proceedings is inadmissible in mitigation of damages in an action by the widow for the death of her husband, although the fact that they were not living together at the time of his death is competent as bearing upon her pecuniary loss of support.

Co.* (1911) 186 Fed. 175, holding it to be improper to inquire into the state of the domestic affairs of the deceased and his wife in an action to recover damages for his negligent death, unless the purpose is to show the discontinuance of the marital relation.

W. 1061, holding that evidence of a divorce decree, divorcing the deceased from the mother of his child, giving her the custody of the child, and providing for the payment to her of a stated sum of money for the support of the child, is inadmissible in behalf of the defendant to diminish the damages recoverable for the benefit of the child.

gaged to marry, since the pecuniary loss is to be based upon conditions as they existed at the time of the death complained of.<sup>47</sup> It has been held that evidence is admissible to show that the surviving widow, for several years prior to the injury and death of her husband, had been living in adultery and prostitution, and had not been supported by the decedent.<sup>48</sup> And it may be shown that the relationship or feelings existing between the deceased and his beneficiaries were such that they had no reasonable expectation of pecuniary aid from his continued life, or not to the extent claimed by plaintiff.<sup>49</sup> And in behalf of the plaintiff it may be shown that the deceased entertained a very friendly feeling or strong affection for his beneficiaries, and in this regard evidence is admissible as to his conduct toward and treatment of them.<sup>50</sup> For example, evi-

6. Contributions made and services rendered.

Evidence is admissible as to contributions by the deceased in his lifetime to the support, aid, or benefit of his beneficiaries,<sup>52</sup> and where the deceased was the mother of infant children, evidence may be given as to the value of her services to them;<sup>53</sup> and the inten-

And Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ryan (1901) 62 Kan. 682, 64 Pac. 603, holding that declarations of collateral kindred are admissible in favor of the defendant to show that the deceased had never contributed to their support.

But see Bonnet v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1895) 89 Tex. 72, 33 S. W. 334, holding that evidence that an adult son during his minority had paid all his earnings to his father is inadmissible.

through the negligence of the defendant may and generally does have a direct bearing upon their pecuniary loss. Thus, it may be reasonably presumed that a father, if living, would supply the material needs of a minor child. The needs of such a child are therefore a material matter of inquiry, and they are largely dependent upon the physical condition of the child. If not in good health or in any way crippled, the need of the child is greater than it otherwise would be, and hence its pecuniary loss by the death of the parent is greater. This is likewise true as to the widow and other beneficiaries of the decedent, where there is a reasonable ground for expectation that the decedent would have supplied their needs. Hence, by the great weight of authority, evidence is admissible to show the pecuniary and physical condition of the beneficiaries, especially that of the widow and children, in order to show their pecuniary loss by the destruction of the life of the decedent.<sup>59</sup> In this regard it may be shown what

Whatever made the life of the deceased of pecuniary value to his surviving children, whether arising on the one hand from the ability or disposition of the deceased to contribute to their support, as evidenced by his capacity to earn money and accumulate property, his inclination to provide support, the condition of his health, and probable duration of life, or on the other hand from the necessity that the survivors receive sustenance, as measured by the number, age, sex, health, or condition in life of the survivors left dependent upon the decedent for care, support, and maintenance, may be shown in estimating the pecuniary and just measure of the value of his life.

Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Younger (1897) 90 Tex. 387, 38 S. W. 1121, 1 Am. Neg. Rep. 378, holding that the amount of recovery by a child for the death of its mother is not affected by the financial condition of the family, but the circumstances which surround the mother and child are different in wealthy and in poor families, and therefore the financial condition of the family is admissible to show what aid the child could expect to receive from the continuance of the mother's life under the circumstances as shown by the evidence. And it has been held in this state that the necessitous condition of the daughter may be shown in the action to recover damages for the death of the father by the wrongful act of the defendant, as bearing upon the question of the amount he would have contributed to her support had he lived. *St. Louis Southwestern R. by the son, as indicating the situation and circumstances of the parties.

Staal v. Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. (1885) 57 Mich. 239, 23 N. W. 795, holding that, where the action is to recover damages for the death of the head of a family, the fullest insight into the family circumstances is of value in determining to what extent they are injured thereby.

Murphy v. Erie R. Co. (1911) 202 N. Y. 242, 95 N. E. 699, holding that evidence is admissible as to the decedent's age, sex, health, and general intelligence, and relation to the next of kin, and their condition of life, as bearing upon the pecuniary loss suffered by them.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Wightman (1877) 29 Gratt. (Va.) 431, 26 Am. Rep. 384, holding that evidence as to the relationship and dependent condition of the parties, the mental and physical capacity and ability of the deceased, and all the surrounding circumstances and situation of the family is competent in order to enable the jury properly to estimate the loss sustained and assess the damages. Reversed on other grounds in (1881) 104 U. S. 5, 26 L. ed. 643.

On this point in Lazelle v. Newfane (Vt.) supra, the court says: "Human lives are not of equal pecuniary value, and the value of services rendered depends upon the wants of the beneficiary; therefore it is competent to show the situation of the persons who claim to have been so injured, and the occasion for and value to them of the services of the deceased. The death of the father of young children who required his care and training would be a greater pecuniary loss to them than the death of a father would be who had become almost wholly dependent upon his children for his maintenance. So the loss of a husband who maintained and cared for his wife connection evidence is admissible as to the crippled condition or the poor health of the beneficiaries.<sup>62</sup> In some jurisdictions apparently a narrower view is taken as to the bearing of this character of evidence, and it has been held that would be a greater pecuniary loss to her than if he were indolent, thriftless, and were supported by her."

Everts v. Santa Barbara Consol. R. Co. (1906) 3 Cal. App. 712, 86 Pac. 830, holding that evidence is admissible as to the ill health of the wife of the decedent, as tending in some degree to establish her pecuniary loss from the death of her husband.

Coffeyville Min. & Gas Co. v. Carter (1902) 65 Kan. 565, 70 Pac. 635, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 594, holding, where a daughter in her representative capacity is seeking to recover damages for the death of her father, for the benefit of herself and other children of the deceased, that she may show that she is, and for years has been, in bad health, and that her father was kind and affectionate toward her and the other children.

Lockwood v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 98 N. Y. 523, holding that evidence is admissible that the adult children of the deceased had no property of their own, and that a daughter who had lived with him was so afflicted with a disease that it interfered with her ability to work.

De Luna v. Union R. Co. (1909) 130 App. Div. 386, 114 N. Y. Supp. 893, holding that pecuniary injuries to statutory beneficiaries are to be determined from the evidence, which is as a rule limited to the age, sex, and intelligence of the deceased, and the situation and condition of the survivors and their relations to the decedent.

Texas Midland R. Co. v. Crowder (1901) 25 Tex. Civ. App. 536, 64 S. W. 90, holding that evidence is admissible to show that one of the daughters of the deceased was seriously affected with a disease existing for years, and that the deceased, her father, kept a horse and buggy for the principal purpose of sending her to school.

Lynch v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1915) 89 Vt. 363, 95 Atl. 683, holding that evidence is admissible to show that a seventeen-year-old daughter surviving the deceased had never been strong enough to care for herself, and was not physically able to earn her living, and that the deceased provided her with everything that she needed, and assisted in caring for her.

Evans v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1910) 37 Utah, 431, 108 Pac. 638, Ann. Cas. 1912C, 259, holding that evidence is admissible as to the poor physical condition of the widow of the deceased, and her inability to do evidence is inadmissible to show the pecuniary or physical condition or the state of health of the beneficiaries.<sup>63</sup> This holding is based on the ground that such evidence has no legitimate bearing upon the pecuniary loss to the benehousework, and the necessity of caring for her.

McKeigue v. Janesville (1887) 68 Wis. 50, 31 N. W. 298, holding it not to be error to admit evidence that two of the younger children of the decedent are in poor health, as bearing upon their pecuniary loss from the death of their mother; and see Johnson v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1885) 64 Wis. 425, 25 N. W. 223.

On this point in Hunt v. Conner (1901) 26 Ind. App. 41, 59 N. E. 50, it is said: "Whatever material need of a surviving minor child it may reasonably be presumed would have been supplied by the father if alive, and is lost through his death, or must be provided for from some other source, is a pecuniary loss. If it be a permanent incapacity of an infant daughter, it is not beyond the discretion of the jury to determine that the father, if he had survived, would have continued during its life to provide for it, as he would have continued to provide for his wife during the joint lives of the husband and wife. The evidence of the existence of the permanent disability and consequent need of a father's continued care and protection and support is no more immaterial or remote in such an inquiry than evidence, in addition to proof that children survived, of the number thereof, and of their respective ages. The evidence to which the appellant objected did not merely prove a need of the beneficiary; it tended, we think, in this instance, to prove also a material loss, and therefore it was not inadmissible."

<sup>63</sup> Seattle Electric Co. v. Hartless (1906) 75 C. C. A. 317, 144 Fed. 379, holding that, under the Washington statute providing that, when the death of a person was caused by the wrongful act, etc., of another, his heirs or personal representatives may maintain an action against the person causing the death, and the jury may give such damages, pecuniary or exemplary, as under all the circumstances of the case to them may seem just, and further providing that no action for a personal injury occasioning death shall abate if the injured person had a wife or children living, but such action may be prosecuted or commenced and prosecuted in favor of the wife or the wife and children, or if the wife is not living, then in favor of the children, evidence is inadmissible to show the physical condition of any of the statutory beneficiaries. The court said that their physical condition had nothing whatever to do with the pecuniary loss the decedent's death occasioned them.

Green v. Southern P. Co. (1898) 122 Cal. 563, 55 Pac. 577, holding that it is not competent to show that a child is without

Hughes v. Danville Brick Co. (1913) 180 Ill. App. 603, holding that evidence is inadmissible as to the pecuniary condition of the widow and family of the deceased, although it is competent to show that they were dependent upon the deceased for support at the time of his death.

Hunn v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1889) 78 Mich. 513, 7 L.R.A. 500, 44 N. W. 502, holding that evidence is not admissible as to the extent of the means of the decedent, or of the amount of encumbrance upon land he left.

(1896) — Tex. Civ. App. —, 35 S. W. 488, holding that, in an action by the widow to recover for the wrongful death of her husband, it may be shown that she had no other means of support, and that the decedent had nothing but his wages at the time of his death.

In Boswell v. Barnhart (1895) 96 Ga. 521, 23 S. E. 414, it is held that, in an action by a widow to recover for the death of her husband, evidence on the part of the defendant is incompetent to show that to all appearances the plaintiff was better provided for than prior to the death of her husband, that she and her children were then constantly in rags and in destitute condition, and that the deceased was constantly in criminal scrapes, if not in jail under criminal charges, where, by statute, the measure of damages was the gross value of the decedent's life without regard to whether or not the wife had previously received anything from him, and without reference to what his personal expenses may have been.

<sup>64</sup>Preble v. Wabash R. Co. (1909) 243 Ill. 340, 90 N. E. 716, holding that evidence is admissible to show that the decedent was the sole support of his widow at the time of his death, although proof of the pecuniary circumstances of the widow would be improper.

Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kinmare (1903) 203 Ill. 388, 67 N. E. 826, holding that, in an action by a personal representative to recover the pecuniary loss sustained by the widow and next of kin through the wrongful death of his decedent, their dependency upon the decedent may be shown, but not their necessitous condition, as the fact that there are some of them who are blind, palsied, deaf, or crippled.

Swift v. Foster (1896) 163 Ill. 50, 44 N. E. 837, holding that it is competent to show that the widow and children of the deceased were dependent upon him before and at the time of his death for their support, but it is not competent to show their pecuniary circumstances.

Pennsylvania, Co. v. Keane (1892) 143 Ill. 172, 32 N. E. 260, holding that, in an action by a widow as administratrix of the estate of her husband, to recover for his wrongful death, she may testify that at the time of his death the decedent was her sole support.

Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Johnson (1882) 103 Ill. 512; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. May (1883) 108 Ill. 288, holding that the widow may show her prior dependency upon the deceased for support.

And see Litchfield & M. R. Co. v. Shuler (1907) 134 Ill. App. 615, holding that, in a suit by a widow as administratrix to reis the value of the life lost, the physical condition, age, etc., of the statutory beneficiaries, are not material, for these matters have no bearing upon the amount of recovery; that is to be determined from data as to the decedent and those entitled under the statute to participate in the judgment rendered.<sup>65</sup>

In any event, for evidence of the pecuniary or physical condition of the statutory beneficiaries to be admissible there must have been a dependent connection between decedent and the surviving relatives. Thus, evidence is not admissible as to the feeble health or crippled condition of persons other than those entitled under the statute to participate in the damages awarded for the destruction of the decedent's life.<sup>66</sup> And evidence is not generally admissible of hardships and financial losses endured by the beneficiaries since the death of the decedent. For example, evidence is inadmissible as to their ill health or as to specific instances of hardship other than a general dependent or crippled condition, since that time,<sup>67</sup> or that they have been compelled to work for a living.<sup>68</sup> But it has been held that evidence is admissible that a child was born to cover for the death of her husband, evidence is inadmissible that she and her minor children were dependent upon the deceased for support at the time of the injury which resulted in his death; Brennen v. Chicago & C. Coal Co. (1909) 241 Ill. 610, 89 N. E. 756, holding that evidence is inadmissible as to the resources of the widow of the decedent or her financial condition; Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woolridge (1898) 174 Ill. 330, 51 N. E. 701, holding that the poverty, health, helplessness, or dependency of the lineal next of kin of the decedent is immaterial on the question of the amount of recovery for his wrongful death based upon the statute limiting the damages recoverable to the pecuniary loss of the statutory beneficiaries. In this case it is pointed out that the loss is the amount which the deceased would have added to his estate had he lived out his natural life. But it is immaterial whether or not the next of kin had other pecuniary resources. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Moranda (1879) 93 Ill. 302, 34 Am. Rep. 168, 14 Am. Neg. Cas. 362; *Heyer v. ### S. Pecuniary condition of the deceased.

As a general rule evidence is inadmissible to show the pecuniary condition of the deceased at the time of his death,<sup>70</sup> although, as shown in another note in this series, evidence that the deceased had accumulated property during his lifetime is admissible as bearing upon his earning capacity and his probable accumulation of property had he lived out his natural life.<sup>71</sup> As a practical matter, the pecuniary condition of the deceased at the time of his death may be indirectly shown, at least in some cases, by evidence of the dependent and needy condition of the widow and children of the deceased. Except as admitted in this manner, or for the purpose of showing the earning capacity or business ability of the deceased, evidence has been held inadmissible in behalf of the defendant to show that the widow and children or other beneficiaries, as a matter of fact, have profited by the death of the decedent because of property which he had accumulated and which came to them,<sup>72</sup> nor is evidence admis-

Central R. Co. v. Moore (1878) 61 Ga. 151, holding that, in an action by a widow to recover for the death of her husband, evidence is inadmissible to show that since her husband's death she has worked in the fields for a living.

Starcher v. South Penn Oil Co. (1918) — W. Va. —, 95 S. E. 28, holding that evidence is inadmissible in behalf of the widow that the deceased owned a farm which had not been paid for. Receipt of such evidence, however, was held not to be reversible error.

Cas. 71, holding to be irrelevant evidence tending to show the amount of property left by the decedent as bearing upon his capacity to earn and accumulate money, for, if this evidence should show a large estate, there are many ways by which it might be explained otherwise than by the capacity of the deceased to accumulate money, and if it shows a small estate there are as many ways in which it could be accounted for consistent with the highest capacity to earn and acquire; hence such evidence would tend rather to confuse than to aid the investigation.

Stahler v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1901) 199 Pa. 383, 85 Am. #### 9. Pecuniary condition of the defendant.

In general the financial condition of the defendant and his ability to respond in damages have no legitimate bearing either upon the question of his liability or the amount of damages recoverable for negligently causing the death of another, where the damages are limited to compensation for the pecuniary loss to the statutory beneficiaries. Hence, evidence of the wealth of the defendant is inadmissible.<sup>75</sup> This rule, however, has been held not to apply where the damages recoverable are punitive or exemplary, based upon the wrongful or wanton act of defendant, and in such case his wealth may be shown.<sup>76</sup>

W. 113, holding where the damages recoverable consist of compensation to the children or parents, in an action by adult children for the wrongful death of their mother, where the only aid they received was a part of the income she received from property, the defendant may show in mitigation of damages that the plaintiff received such property through the death of their mother.

Adult children suing for the death of their mother may introduce in evidence an L.R.A. 1918C.

10. Expenses of decedent paid by defendant.

In an action to recover compensation to the statutory beneficiaries for their pecuniary loss by the destruction of the life of a relative, the defendant is not entitled to show, either in bar or in mitigation of damages, that he paid out large sums of money for the support and maintenance of the deceased and for his medical expenses after he was injured and before he died.<sup>77</sup>

11. Sufficiency of the evidence.

a. In general—loss to family.

In considering the sufficiency of the evidence to entitle the plaintiff to recover substantial damages for the negligent destruction of the life of his decedent, in behalf of designated beneficiaries, the relation existing between the decedent and these beneficiaries is of importance. It is to be noted in this regard, however, that it is not necessary to show that the statutory beneficiary had a legal claim upon the decedent for support or aid.<sup>78</sup> As heretofore pointed

E. 564, holding that evidence of amounts paid by the defendant during the lifetime of the decedent to cover his support, maintenance, and medical expenses, as well as evidence as to the amount paid for his funeral expenses, is not admissible in behalf of the defendant, either in bar or in mitigation of damages, in an action by the injured person's personal representative to recover the pecuniary loss to the statutory beneficiaries through his death, where the sums thus paid out were not paid in settlement of the claim of the decedent.

out, and as more particularly shown in another note in this series,<sup>79</sup> a presumption of pecuniary loss exists in favor of the widow and children and the parents of minor children. But this presumption does not exist in favor of collateral kindred, and the courts are not agreed as to whether or not it exists in favor of a parent for the death of an adult child,<sup>80</sup> or in favor of an adult child for the death of a parent.<sup>81</sup>

One effect of this presumption, where it exists, is to relieve the plaintiff of the necessity of making direct proof of pecuniary loss, this essential resting in inference from general evidence. For for wrongful death does not depend upon the ability of the widow and next of kin of the decedent to show that they would have had a legal claim on the deceased for support had he survived.

E. 699, holding that it is always proper, and sometimes necessary, to make proof of such facts as the age, sex, health, and general intelligence of the person killed, and his relation to the next of kin, and their condition in life, for all these matters have a bearing upon the question of pecuniary loss suffered by those for whose benefit the action is maintained.

been held that evidence of the decedent's age, habit of industry, means, business, character, etc., is not only admissible, but that it is indispensable to the recovery of substantial damages.<sup>87</sup>

Generally, however, many of these requirements may be dispensed with without affecting the right of the plaintiff to recover substantial damages. For example, evidence of the amount actually contributed by the deceased to the support of his family is not essential to the recovery of substantial damages in their behalf, where there is evidence as to his life expectancy, health, habits of industry, etc., and the manner in which he supported his wife and children.<sup>88</sup> Even though there is no precise evidence as to the value of the decedent's life, the widow is entitled to recover substantial damages for his death where there is evidence that the decedent was an active workman and earned a good living for himself and family.<sup>89</sup> And evidence merely that deceased was a stout healthy man of a given age, and that he was survived by a minor son who was living with him, was held sufficient to carry the case to the jury on the question of whether or not the son suffered pecuniary loss, and if so the amount thereof.<sup>90</sup> It is not essential to show that the next of kin would probably have received from the deceased contributions of money or of things purchased with money.<sup>91</sup>

Evidence as to the earnings of the deceased and as to his contributing a reasonable amount thereof toward the support of his family,<sup>92</sup> or as to the age, occupation, or condition in life of the deceased,<sup>93</sup> has been held sufficient to sustain a substantial recovery in behalf of his beneficiaries. But evidence of the earnings of the deceased is not essential where there are data with regard to the deceased, his employment, the manner in which he supported his family, or their circumstances or condition, from which the jury may estimate their pecuniary loss,<sup>94</sup> and the failure to produce evidence of the earnings of the

Butler County Light Co.* (1917) 255 Pa. 590, 100 Atl. 452, holding that evidence as to the decedent's life expectancy, occupation, health, habits of industry, and the manner in which he supported his wife and children, will sustain a verdict for substantial damages, although there is no direct evidence as to the amount actually contributed by the deceased to his wife and family.

<sup>89</sup> Murdock v. Brown (1885) 16 Mo. App. 548, holding, in an action by a widow to recover damages for the death of her husband, a judgment in her favor will not be reversed because there is no precise evidence as to the value of decedent's life, where, however, it was shown that he was an active workman and earned a good living for himself and family.

deceased, the amount he contributed to the support of his family, or as to the time he spent with them, or what he did toward educating his children, does not necessarily preclude the recovery of more than nominal damages.<sup>95</sup> It has, however, been held that evidence of the age, health, and habits of the deceased, without any showing as to his earning capacity or expenditures, is not sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover substantial damages.<sup>96</sup> But evidence as to the age of the deceased and that upon the day he was killed, and for a long time prior thereto, he had been performing manual labor for which he received good wages, is some evidence from which the jury may estimate the pecuniary loss to his beneficiaries, although there is no evidence as to his habit of saving his earnings or of any contributions made by him to his beneficiaries.<sup>97</sup> Where the widow is in court it is not essential to offer evidence as to her age and health, for the jury may judge for themselves in this regard.<sup>98</sup> And it has been held that evidence that there were statutory beneficiaries dependent upon

In Missouri P. R. Co. v. Moffatt (1899) 60 Kan. 113, 72 Am. St. Rep. 343, 55 Pac. 837, although no evidence was given as to the amount the deceased earned or had earned, or as to the amount of pecuniary aid or benefit which it would have been possible for him to give to his children in the future, a judgment for $5,000 damages was affirmed, there being evidence of the age and health of the deceased, and as to his habits of industry and sobriety and the character of his employment, and evidence that he supported himself and family of six children, four of whom were girls.

State* (1866) 24 Md. 271, holding that, where evidence is given as to the age, habits, health, and occupation of the deceased, and also as to the number of his family, and their condition before and after his death, the court should not direct the jury to assess nominal damages only, although there is no proof as to the amount of wages earned.

ample, the personal attention of the husband to insure her comfort, and the many ways he can make himself useful and helpful, should be taken into consideration in assessing her loss. Foster v. Butler County Light Co. supra, note 88.

Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Phillips (1902) 100 Va. 362, 41 S. E. 726, holding the evidence that the deceased was thirty-eight years of age, and had been for some time in the employ of the defendants as a section hand, and received wages sufficient to support his wife and eight children, is sufficient to sustain a reasonable verdict in behalf of his widow and family, although there is no direct evidence as to his probable earnings, considering his age, business capacity, experience, habits, energy, perseverance, etc.

And see Dillon v. Hudson, P. & S. Electric R. Co. (1905) 73 N. H. 367, 62 Atl. 93, holding that, although there is evidence that the decedent, the wife of the plaintiff, never earned any money and probably never would earn any, the jury are not thereby required to find that the decedent did not have the capacity to earn money.

Meng v. Emigrant Industrial Sav. Bank (1915) 169 App. Div. 27, 154 N. Y. Supp. 509, holding that, where the widow is in court, it is not necessary to introduce proof as to her age and state of health, as the jury may judge as to her age and health by her looks.

the deceased and as to the amount that he contributed to their support is sufficient without proving their ages.<sup>99</sup>

And it has been held that, where the evidence fails to show the habits of the deceased for industry and sobriety, his treatment of his family, and whether he ever contributed to their support, the law presumes that the deceased was sober and industrious, treated his family tenderly and properly, and contributed sufficiently toward their support.<sup>100</sup>

But where the only evidence to show pecuniary loss to the widow from the death of her husband was that the husband earned a certain amount of money per month and lived with his mother, it is not sufficient to sustain a verdict of substantial damages in behalf of the widow.<sup>101</sup>

b. Loss to husband.

For the husband of the person negligently killed to be entitled to recover his pecuniary loss based upon loss of services of the deceased, it is not essential to prove the value of the services with mathematical certainty.<sup>102</sup> Generally, evidence as to the age of the deceased, her strength, health, life expectancy, and her good qualities as mother and housekeeper, is sufficient in this regard,<sup>103</sup> and even evidence of the age, capacity, and situation of the deceased, and as to the business and condition of the husband, will make a sufficient case of pecuniary loss to him, although the deceased was not living with him at the time of her injury and death.<sup>104</sup> But it is not enough to prove the marriage, the age of the parties, and the death of the wife, and then turn the jury loose upon the field of speculation or prejudice to hunt for some basis for a verdict.<sup>105</sup>

c. Loss of parental care and training to children.

Where one element of damages sought to be recovered in behalf of the minor children is the loss of parental care and training, by the great weight of authority it is sufficient in this regard to show the good character of the deceased and his devotion to his family,<sup>106</sup> especially where there is also evidence that the

Supp. 740, holding that, although at the time a woman was killed she was not living with her husband, and she was successfully conducting a business of her own, nevertheless, in an action for her wrongful death for the benefit of her husband, the jury should not be limited to a verdict of nominal damages, there being evidence of the decedent's earning capacity, expectancy of life, etc., and the husband being entitled to a share of the wife's personal property in event that he survived her.

And see Ingraffia v. Samuels (1902) 71 App. Div. 14, 75 N. Y. Supp. 718, holding, where there is evidence as to the sex, age, capacity, and situation of the deceased, and as to the next of kin, and as to the business, occupation, and condition of the husband, and also evidence that the deceased left a father and brother surviving her, although their exact condition is not shown, that the evidence is sufficient to support a verdict for substantial damages.

Wabash R. Co. v. Gretzinger (1914) 182 Ind. 155, 104 N. E. 60, holding, where a child is of tender age, that it is not error to submit to the jury the question of the loss of parental care, training, advice, guidance, etc., through the death of the father, although the only evidence bearing upon this point is that the deceased was sober, industrious, and devoted his earnings to the support of his wife and child.

deceased undertook to instruct his children.<sup>107</sup> So, where there is testimony concerning the personal qualities of the deceased, and the interest which he had in his family, it is proper to instruct the jury that they may take into consideration the care, attention, instruction, training, and guidance which the evidence shows the deceased reasonably might have expected to give his children during their minority, and to include the pecuniary value thereof in the damages assessed.<sup>108</sup>

It has been held that, to entitle children to have considered as an element of their damages from the death of their father loss of nurture, instruction, and moral and physical training, there must be evidence of the value of decedent's instruction and physical, moral, and intellectual training, and not merely inferences which may arise from evidence that he rendered them occasional assistance in their studies, such as a parent is supposed to render his children.<sup>109</sup>

In general, it may be said that, to recover in behalf of children for care, training, and support after reaching majority, there must be some evidence showing that they had a reasonable expectation of the continuation of benefits of this character, or that there was a reasonable probability that they would continue to receive the same.<sup>110</sup>

A PPEAL by plaintiff from an order of the District Court for Cherokee County sustaining a motion to set aside the service of summons in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have occurred prior to the appointment of a receiver of the defendant company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Charles Stephens, for appellant:

If the railway corporations made some man its agent to act for it from day to day in business matters in which it had no right to act, it cannot be heard to say thereafter that, by reason of the fact that it was acting unlawfully when it was within the jurisdiction of this court and when summons was served upon it, such service is therefore not good.

Porter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The trial court sustained a motion to set aside the service of summons, and the plaintiff appeals.

The action was brought October 4, 1915, to recover against the railway company for injuries alleged to have occurred several years prior thereto. In September, 1915, by an order of the Federal court, a receiver was appointed for the railway company, and all the property and assets of the corporation of every kind and nature, and wherever situated or found, was by the order of the court taken out of its hands and turned over to the receiver, who was ordered to operate the same.

The summons was served upon E. R. Lane, and the return recites that "the said E. R. Lane being the general station agent and representative of said defendants and each of them in said capacity, the president, vice president, treasurer, secretary, chairman of the board of directors, or other chief officers not being found in my county, and the said defendants or either of them, not having designated any person or officer upon whom service of process could be made under the provision of the statute."

Section 72 of the Civil Code (Gen. Stat. 1915, § 6963), which provides for the manner of service of summons on a railroad corporation, reads: "Such process may be served on any local superintendent of repairs, freight agent, agent to sell tickets, or station keeper of such company or corporation in such county, or such process may be served by leaving a copy thereof at any depot or station of such company or corporation in such county, with some person in charge thereof and in the employ of such company or corporation, and such service shall be held and deemed complete and effectual."

It is the contention of plaintiff that the testimony taken on the hearing of the motion conclusively establishes that E. R. Lane, at the time the summons was served, was the station agent of the defendant. He testified in substance that the duties performed by him in the office and at the station had been the same during the last five years, and that after the appointment of the receiver he had performed certain services for the railway company which consisted of looking after a number of collections for services rendered by the railway company previous to the appointment of the receiver; that he had never been discharged by the railway company, except as he was notified by a circular letter sent to all the employees at the time the receiver was appointed. There is a stipulation that after the receivership the name of the Missouri, Kansas, & Texas Railway Company remained uncanceled on all stationery and forms of printed blanks just as it had been previous to the appointment of the receiver.

The findings of the court are that the receiver took charge of the property about September 26, 1915, and that E. R. Lane proceeded to look after the business under the employment of the receiver, otherwise performing practically the same duties as those he had been performing in the past; that other than by circular letter to all the employees notifying them of the receivership, he had not been formally discharged by the company; and that in the first two or three months following the receivership he collected a number of small items of freight and remitted them to the railway company as he was directed to do as general freight and ticket agent at Columbus; and that he was receipted for the same by the railway company, and not by the receiver.

In our opinion the order setting aside the service must be affirmed. Whatever duties the station agent performed after the appointment of the receiver, he performed as agent of the receiver. Under the terms of the order appointing the receiver, the station agent was not in a position where, in the conduct of the same business, he could serve two masters. All the property and assets of the defendant company were taken out of its control and placed in the hands of the receiver to control and operate. If all the former employees of the railway company continued to be the agents of the company until they could be individually notified of their discharge and re-employment by the receiver, an intolerable situation would arise not contemplated by the order of the court, and one which would benefit neither the public nor the property. No formal discharge by the railway company of its former employees was required in order to sever the relation of employer and employee. That resulted immediately on the making of the order appointing the receiver. The railway corporation was not dissolved by the appointment; is still exists as a legal entity, and it may have agents for certain purposes; but no person in the employ of the receiver, in operating the railway or in handling any of the assets or property of the railway company, can be regarded as the agent of the company merely because of the duties performed by him. Whatever any servant, agent, or employee does in connection with the operation or control of any of the assets or property of the railway company is performed as agent of the receiver, and not of the company.

The fact that the name of the railway company remained on the blanks used by the receiver in the conduct of the business is of no probative force, any more than the fact that the name on the cars and engines of the company was not changed. In Union P. R. Co. v. Smith, 59 Kan. 80, 52 Pac. 102, the question arose over the admissibility of testimony to the effect that the engine causing the injury was a Union Pacific engine, and that the employees were employees of the Union Pacific, and it was said in the opinion: "In speaking of a railroad in the hands of receivers, it is usually designated by the name of the road, or of the corporation owning it, rather than that of the receivers. No confusion ordinarily arises, and there is none in this case. Proof that the property was Union Pacific property was competent evidence against the receivers, whose duty it was to have charge of the property. Proof that the employees were Union Pacific employees was good proof that they were employees of the receivers, when the fact became clearly established that the receivers had entire and exclusive control of all the properties of the company and of the transaction of all its business." p. 85.

In St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Bricker, 65 Kan. 321, 69 Pac. 328, 12 Am. Neg. Rep. 438, the question involved was whether or not an employee of the receiver was also an employee of the corporation, the principal contention being that the corporation was not liable for an injury occasioned by the negligence of the employees of the receiver. It was said in the opinion: "The principle of respondeat superior has no application. The receivers were the officers of the court and not the agents of the corporation, and the corporation is not, therefore, liable for the acts of the receivers, or the acts of their employees." p. 326.

Because the corporation could only be liable in consequence of some negligence of its own agents or employees, it was held that the company was not liable. It was said in the opinion: "The plaintiff, when injured, was not an employee of the corporation, and his injuries are not the result of the negligent act of any agent of the corporation or of the mismanagement of any engineer or employee of the corporation." p. 327.

The same question involved here has arisen in a number of cases. The decisions, however, are controlled by statutes, some of which differ from our provision as to the manner of service upon a railway company. A case directly in point is Cain v. Seaboard Air-Line R. Co. 7 Ga. App. 461, 67 S. E. 127. It was there held that "service of a suit against a corporation in the hands of a receiver, by serving an agent of the receiver, which agent had formally occupied the same position for the corporation, is not good service as to the corporation, (a) because, in order for service upon a corporation to be effective by reason of service upon an agent, the agent must at the time of service be in fact the agent of the corporation; and (b) because, when a corporation is in the hands of a receiver who is conducting its business, the agents and employees are no longer those of the corporation, but are the agents of the receiver. Cherry v. North & South R. Co. 59 Ga. 447; Henderson v. Walker, 55 Ga. 481; Ocean S. S. Co. v. Wilder, 107 Ga. 220, 33 S. E. 179." p. 462.

It is argued that the court committed error in ignoring certain presumptions. It is said in the briefs "that it is the legal duty of a sheriff, in serving papers, to make due inquiry as to the identity of the person on whom such papers are served, and in all cases, until the contrary is shown by a clear preponderance of the evidence, the presumption is that such officer has performed his duty and his return speaks the truth."

The sheriff made due inquiry as to the identity of the person on whom he served the papers, and there is no question as to the correctness of the return in this respect. He did, in fact, serve the papers on E. R. Lane, who was the station agent; but when the order of the court appointing the receiver was introduced in evidence, it was shown that the sheriff was mistaken in stating that Lane was the agent of the railway company.

It is seriously contended that, because the court reserved the right to modify the order and to enlarge or diminish the duties of the receiver, it devolved on the defendant to show that some other order had not been made in the meantime authorizing the railway company to operate or control its property. The presumption, however, is that the order continued in force and effect until the contrary is shown. Again, it is said that "there is no evidence properly admitted even tending to overturn the presumption that the receiver acted within his authority when he permitted the railway company, through its agent Lane, to remain" at the station and "collect for its outstanding accounts," etc.

The contention begs the question by assuming that Lane was the agent of the railway company.

The judgment is affirmed.

White, C., filed the following opinion:

The assistant prosecuting attorney of St. Louis court of criminal correction filed information in that court charging that the defendants "did on the 4th day of October, 1915, unlawfully and wilfully offer for sale, and keep on hand for the purpose of sale, to Stocker Brothers, a corporation, a substance" which is described as composed of animal fat, etc., and colored in imitation of butter. The charge is a violation of § 651, Rev. Stat. 1909. The case was first appealed to this court (270 Mo. 694, 195 S. W. 996) and transferred to the St. Louis court of appeals for want of jurisdiction. On a hearing, a majority of the St. Louis court of appeals (— Mo. App. —, 198 S. W. 457) held that the evidence sustained the verdict of guilty as charged in the information, but Judge Reynolds of that court, dissenting, caused the same to be certified to this court on the ground that the majority opinion was in conflict with the decision of the Kansas City court of appeals in the case of State v. Scott, reported in — Mo. App. —, 189 S. W. 1191, and with the decision of this court in the case of State v. Rosenberger, 212 Mo. 648, 20 L.R.A. (N.S.) 284, 126 Am. St. Rep. 580, 111 S. W. 509.

The evidence shows that the defendant Swift & Company had what is called a "plant" in East St. Louis, Illinois, and that the defendant Hunter was manager of the business of that corporation at that place. Stocker Brothers was a corporation engaged in the grocery business in the city of St. Louis, Missouri. On October 4, 1915, someone representing Stocker Brothers in St. Louis called Swift & Company in East St. Louis on the telephone and ordered 150 pounds of colored Lincoln oleo. That amount of that commodity, being five 30-pound cases, was then separated from the general stock, loaded into a wagon belonging to Swift & Company, hauled to Stocker Brothers' store in St. Louis, Missouri, and there delivered; the price for the same was charged to Stocker Brothers by Swift & Company, and the bill was paid November 26, 1915.

There is no dispute that this commodity was of a character condemned by the statute. The defendants were arrested on the information above set out, with the result as mentioned. It was held by a majority of the St. Louis court of appeals that the oleomargarin in question was kept on hand by L.R.A.1918C.

the defendants in the city of St. Louis for the purpose of sale. While the statute is leveled at a sale of oleomargarin colored so as to resemble butter, as well as keeping the same on hand for sale, the information does not charge a sale, but charges the keeping on hand and offering for sale.

This case differs from the case of State v. Rosenberger, supra, which concerns the sale of liquor by a firm in Kansas City on an order from a dealer in Webster county, Missouri, a local option county. The liquor was delivered to the railroad and shipped C. O. D. It was held that the sale took place in Kansas City, and not in Webster county, and therefore was not in violation of the Local Option Law. The Rosenberger Case was followed in the Scott Case, and in other cases where liquor was the subject of the sale. In those cases delivery to a carrier C. O. D. was held to be delivery to the purchaser. In this case, Swift & Company sent their own wagon with the oleomargarin to Stocker Brothers' place of business in St. Louis. The bill accompanying the goods bears the mark C. A. F. E., which was explained by Mr. Hunter to mean cost of goods and delivery charges; that the price paid defendants included those items.

The rule in this state in sales of this character is that, where anything remains to be done between the parties before the property is delivered, as separating the specific quantity from a larger amount, or identifying it, the sale is not complete; but after the separation for the purpose of delivery, when there is nothing further to be done except to deliver the goods, the sale is complete and the title passes. Third Nat. Bank v. Smith, 107 Mo. App. loc. cit. 190, 81 S. W. 215; Longsdorff v. Meyers, 171 Mo. App. 255, 157 S. W. 85. The only thing that was lacking in this case was the separation of the goods from the general stock. After they were separated and segregated by placing them in the wagon for the purpose of delivery, it would look as if the contract of sale was complete at that time and title passed, as would have been the case if Swift & Company had had only five cases of oleomargarin and Stocker Brothers had been in the store at the time, designated the five cases, and agreed upon the terms of purchase.

It seems to make no difference that the goods were not paid for at the time, but charged to the purchaser's account. It is held usually that, where a contract of sale is made for a specific article to be charged for, and where there is nothing more to do except to deliver it and collect the price, the contract of sale is complete without delivery and without payment. Com. v. Hess, 148 Pa. 98, 17 L.R.A. 176, 33 Am. St.

Rep. 810, 23 Atl. 977; State v. Davis, 62 W. Va. 600, 14 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1142, 60 S. E. 584. In the Hess Case the seller conducted a wholesale liquor business at a place where it was lawful to do so, but delivered the liquor in question to the purchaser in territories where it was unlawful, and it was held that the sale was complete at the seller's place of business, where the goods were separated from the general stock and the price charged to the purchaser.

For the purpose of this case it is not necessary to hold that the sale under consideration was complete in the state of Illinois. The defendant is charged not with selling, but with keeping, the forbidden commodity on hand for the purpose of sale, and it becomes important to ascertain what is a "sale" for the purpose of which the oleomargarin was alleged to have been kept. Nor are we concerned with the Statute of Frauds, nor the effect of nondelivery upon the rights of third persons. A contract of sale may be fully executed so that title passes, or it merely may be executory. Cunningham v. Ashbrook, 20 Mo. 553; Third Nat. Bank v. Smith, 107 Mo. App. 178, 81 S. W. 215. In general, the acceptance of an order by the person on whom the order is made is a binding agreement between the parties, although there is no completely executed contract of sale. As said in the case of Cunningham v. Ashbrook, 20 Mo. 556: "The term 'sale,' however, in its largest sense, may include every agreement for the transferring of ownership, whether immediate or to be completed afterwards; and goods, in reference to the disposition of them by sale, may be considered as existing separately and ready for immediate delivery, or as a part of a larger mass from which they must be separated by counting, weighing, or measuring, or as goods to be hereafter procured and supplied to the buyer, or to be manufactured for his use."

Then we have this situation: Here was a binding contract entered into between these parties whereby the owner agreed to sell and deliver certain goods to the purchaser. The goods were separated from the general stock for the purpose of such delivery; they were placed in a wagon and taken to St. Louis in pursuance of that purpose, and delivered there. By what stretch of construction could it be said that Swift & Company kept those goods on hand for even an instant of time for the purpose of sale in St. Louis? Stocker Brothers undoubtedly kept oleomargarin for sale, and sold it in St. Louis, but whether there was a proceeding against them does not appear.

A sale is a contract. It includes an agreement upon quality and price, as well as delivery. To say the goods were kept for the L.R.A.1918C.

purpose of selling them is to say they were kept for the purpose of seeking a purchaser, for the purpose of beginning and concluding a bargain by which title would pass. It is not shown that the driver of the wagon had any discretion in the matter, or had any authority whatever to make a contract regarding the property; on the contrary, it appears that he had no discretion except to deliver it in pursuance of a contract previously made. He could not have had the oleomargarin in his custody for the purpose of sale, unless he had authority to make a contract of sale. If, at any point on his way from the plant in East St. Louis to the purchaser's store in St. Louis, he had been accosted by one who wanted to buy, he would have been obliged to say he had no such goods "for sale," but what he had on his wagon were sold. Statutes usually are to be construed so as to give effect to the ordinary meaning of words. State ex rel. Gass v. Gordon, 266 Mo. loc. cit. 411, 181 S. W. 1016. There is no reason why a strained construction should be given the statute with which we have to deal, so as to convict the defendants, because the common understanding of the meaning of the language used seems to accord with the evident purpose of the law.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

(March 1, 1918.)

PETITION for a writ of mandamus to compel respondent to approve officially a certain bond presented to him by petitioner. Writ denied.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Patrick P. Curran and Joseph C. Cawley for petitioner.

Mr. Herbert A. Rice, Attorney General, in propria persona.

Sweetland, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a petition for a writ of mandamus which shall command the respondent, the attorney general of the state of Rhode Island, officially to approve a certain bond presented to him by the petitioner.

The petitioner in substance alleges that he is, and on the 18th day of January, 1918, was, a resident and a duly qualified elector of the city of Cranston; that on said day at a grand committee of the general assembly he was elected to the office of sheriff of Providence county for the term ending February 1, 1920; that in accordance with the provisions of the statute governing such matters (Gen. Laws 1909, chap. 282, § 2), he executed and caused to be executed his bond for $25,000, with sufficient surety in legal form, running to the general treasurer of the state and conditioned upon the true and faithful execution by the petitioner of the duties of said office; that in accordance with the requirements of the statute in that regard, he presented said bond to the respondent for his official approval of the form thereof, in order that the petitioner might deliver said bond to the general treasurer and enter upon the duties of the office of sheriff of Providence county. The petition further sets forth "that said attorney general has withheld his official approval thereof solely on the pretended ground that your petitioner has not been duly and legally elected to said office for the term aforesaid."

It appears that on said January 18, 1918, there was a vacancy in the office of sheriff L.R.A.1918C.

of Providence county for the term ending February 1, 1920, caused by the death of the late Andrew J. Wilcox; that on said day a meeting of the grand committee of the general assembly was called for the purpose of electing a sheriff of Providence county to fill said vacancy; that at the election so held in grand committee, 116 ballots were cast; 37 of said ballots were for the petitioner and 79 ballots were for Jonathan Andrews, of Woonsocket. It further appears that on January 17, 1918, the day preceding said election, said Jonathan Andrews was a representative in the general assembly for the first representative district of Woonsocket; that on said January 17, 1918, said Andrews presented to the house of representatives his resignation as such representative; that on January 17, 1918, said house of representatives by vote accepted the resignation of said Andrews and declared vacant the seat of said Andrews as first representative from Woonsocket.

Under the provisions of article 16 of Amendments to the Constitution of Rhode Island (see Laws 1911, chap. 675), representatives in the general assembly shall hold their offices until their successors are elected and qualified. Chapter 282, § 1, Gen. Laws, 1909, in part, is as follows: "No person shall be eligible to the office of sheriff who shall, at the time of his election, be a member of the general assembly." In the opinion given in answer to questions pertaining to the legality of the election of Jonathan Andrews as sheriff of Providence county, this court advised the governor that, in the circumstances set forth above, the action of the house of representatives in accepting the resignation of said Andrews was a nullity; that said Andrews was a member of the general assembly on January 18, 1918, and his attempted election by said grand committee to the office of sheriff of Providence county was invalid. Re Opinion to Governor, — R. I. —, 102 Atl. 913.

It appears that, at said grand committee and before said election, members of the general assembly who favored the election of the petitioner to said office called the attention of the members of the general assembly then in grand committee to the facts and to the provisions of the Constitution and the statutes which rendered said Andrews ineligible for the office of sheriff of Providence county. Also at that time, in said grand committee, members of the general assembly who favored the election of said Andrews gave it as their opinion that under the provisions of the Constitution, which make each house of the general assembly the judge of the election and qualification of its members, it was within the power of the house of representatives to accept the resignation of said Andrews, and to create a vacancy in the office of representative from the first representative district of Woonsocket; and that said Andrews on January 18, 1918, was not a member of the general assembly.

The provision of our Constitution governing elections in grand committee is contained in § 7 of article 11 of the Amendments to the Constitution, and is as follows: "In elections by the general assembly in grand committee the person receiving a majority of the votes shall be elected."

The petitioner contends before us that, after notice given to the members of the grand committee of the disqualification of said Andrews, the members who cast their ballots for him did so in wilful defiance of law; that the votes so cast were illegal and should be regarded as though they had been knowingly cast for a fictitious person or for a person known by the electors to be dead; that the language appearing in § 7 of article 11 of Amendments to the Constitution should be construed to intend not that a person to be elected in grand committee must receive a majority of the votes cast, but that a person shall be declared elected if he receives a majority of the votes cast for persons eligible for election. The petitioner bases this contention largely upon the authority of certain English election cases and upon certain American cases which in his opinion follow the English doctrine.

Under the so-called English rule, if the candidate at an election who receives the highest number of votes is ineligible, and his disqualification is known to the electors before they vote for him, their votes are to be considered as thrown away, and the candidate who receives the next highest number of votes shall be declared elected if he be qualified. Rex v. Parry, 14 East, 549, 104 Eng. Reprint, 712; Reg. ex rel. Mackley v. Coaks, 3 El. & Bl. 249, 118 Eng. Reprint, 1133, 2 C. L. R. 947, 23 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 133, 18 Jur. 378; Rex v. Hawkins, 10 East, 211, 103 Eng. Reprint, 755. In Indiana the courts have generally adopted the same rule. Copeland v. State, 128 Ind. 51, 25 N. E. 866; Gulick v. New, 14 Ind. 93, 77 Am. Dec. 49. In State ex rel. Clawson v. Bell, 169 Ind. 61, 13 L.R.A.(N.S.) 1013, 124 Am. St. Rep. 203, 82 N. E. 69, however, the Indiana supreme court appears to imply that, in order to treat a vote given for an ineligible candidate as wasted, the circumstances must be such as to warrant the conclusion that the elector "wilfully and obstinately" cast his vote for such ineligible candidate.

It has generally been held by the courts of this country, and in contested election cases in the United States Senate and House of Representatives, that the spirit of our democratic institutions requires that, for a person to be declared elected to public office, he must receive a majority of the votes cast in an election for such office, or when the law so provides a plurality of such votes. In the few cases in which an eligible candidate who has received less than a majority or a plurality has been held to be entitled to an office, the circumstances have been such as to indicate that the electors in voting for a candidate who was disqualified have deliberately intended to throw away their votes. A case of this nature is that of State ex rel. Bancroft v. Frear, 144 Wis. 79, 140 Am. St. Rep. 992, 128 N. W. 1068, in which it appears that a large number of votes were cast for a candidate whom the court found the electors knew to be dead at the time of the election. The general rule in Wisconsin in relation to this question is declared in State ex rel. Dunning v. Giles, 1 Chand. (Wis.) 112, 52 Am. Dec. 149, and State ex rel. Off v. Smith, 14 Wis. 497, and is in accord with the American doctrine.

The underlying question involved in the case at bar has been twice passed upon by this court. In an opinion to the governor, Re Corliss, 11 R. I. 638, 23 Am. Rep. 538, this court advised that, in the case of a candidate for elector of the President and Vice President of the United States, who was disqualified for that office and who at the election received a plurality of the votes given for that office, the disqualification did not result in the election of the candidate next in vote, but in the failure to elect. In that opinion the court said: "The question submitted to us does not allege or imply that the electors, knowing the disqualification, voted for the ineligible candidate in wilful defiance of the law."

In Gill v. Pawtucket, 18 R. I. 281, 27 Atl. 506, one of the candidates at an election for a member of the city council of Pawtucket sought to obtain a writ of mandamus to the body charged with the duty of counting the votes given such election, commanding said body to reject certain votes given at said election for another candidate who was disqualified, and to declare the petitioner elected. The court said: "The question now presented is different from that in Re Corliss, since it is averred in the petition that the electors knew of the fact creating the disqualification. It is not averred, however, that the electors knew that the fact amounted to a disqualification in point of law, or that, knowing the disqualification, they voted for the candidate in defiance of law. Without one or the other of these averments, it is clear, under the cases cited in Re Corliss, supra, that the votes could not be rejected and the petitioner held entitled to the office. Whether, if such facts were averred, that result could be accomplished, is a question not now before us."

The petitioner urges that the case at bar is distinguishable in its facts from these two Rhode Island cases, and that they support his contention here, because in this case the members of the grand committee who voted for said Andrews well knew the fact which caused his disqualification, and before giving in their votes it was specifically pointed out to them that this fact amounted to a disqualification in point of law. The petitioner then argues that the controlling circumstances which did not appear in the Corliss matter and in Gill v. Pawtucket are present here; that, being informed of the fact of his disqualification and being notified of the legal effect of that fact, when, in disregard of such information and notice, members voted for said Andrews, they acted in "wilful defiance of law."

This is not a fair and reasonable conclusion from the circumstances in the case; it is not a proper application of either of the Rhode Island cases referred to, and it is not in accordance with the great weight of American authority. This court used the expressions "defiance of law" and "wilful defiance of law" exactly. It used them as such expressions are employed in the authorities, having reference to conduct on the part of a voter from which a court can fairly infer that he intended to throw his vote away. It is true that the members voting for said Andrews did so vote in disregard of the construction given to the law by the supporters of the petitioner, which is also the construction afterwards placed upon it by this court. If it also appeared that the members so voting admitted the correctness of this construction and then recklessly and contemptuously refused to be governed by such construction and acted in disregard of it, there would be furnished a basis for the petitioner's claim of a "wilful defiance of law," of an intention on the part of such members to waste their votes, and there would be some force in the petitioner's claim that such votes should be entirely disregarded in a consideration of the number of votes cast at said election. It is plain, however, that such was not the attitude of those who voted for Mr. Andrews. It is by no means an unusual situation that members of legislative bodies lack confidence in the assertions of their political opponents, and in perfect good faith differ from them both as to statements of fact and in regard to the interpretation of law. It is apparent that these members desired to cast effective votes; that they believed in the legal soundness of their expressed opinion as to the eligibility of Mr. Andrews, and, having a majority of the votes in grand committee, it is quite unlikely that they deliberately intended to permit the minority to fill the very important office of sheriff of Providence county. In our opinion it would be an entire disregard of the facts to hold that the votes given for Mr. Andrews were cast in wilful defiance of law.

The people of this state have provided in their Constitution that, for the election of a person to office by the general assembly in grand committee, it is requisite that such person should receive a majority of the votes. The circumstances must be very extraordinary which would warrant a finding that a person has been elected to office in the grand committee, in accordance with this provision of the Constitution, who has received but 37 out of a total of 116 votes cast. We are not unmindful of the petitioner's contention that the votes cast for said Andrews were illegal votes and should be entirely disregarded, and that as the petitioner received all of the legal votes cast he has received the "majority of the votes" requisite under the Constitution. This contention is unsound. The votes cast for said Andrews, although they were inefficient votes for the purpose of his election, are not "illegal votes," as that expression is used in cases like the present. The votes cast for him were given in by persons legally entitled to vote at the election; they express in a perfectly legal way the will of the voter. They must be considered in this sense as legal votes cast for sheriff, although the person named upon the ballot was ineligible to be elected to that office. These votes must surely be considered as votes cast in opposition to the candidacy of the petitioner. That such votes should not be regarded as nullities, in a consideration of the total number of votes cast, is in accordance with many decisions dealing with the subject in American courts. In Saunders v. Haynes, 13 Cal. 145, the court said: "The votes are not less legal votes because given to a person in whose behalf they cannot be counted." This principle was reaffirmed in Crawford v. Dunbar, 52 Cal. 36. In Com. ex rel. McLaughlin v. Cluley, 56 Pa. 270, 94 Am. Dec. 75, the court said: "The votes cast at an election for a person who is disqualified from holding an office are not nullities." To the same effect are the cases of People ex rel. Crawford v. Molitor, 23 Mich. 341; Barnum v. Gilman, 27 Minn.

466, 38 Am. Rep. 304, 8 N. W. 375; Swepton v. Barton, 39 Ark. 549; Gardner v. Burke, 61 Neb. 534, 85 N. W. 541; People ex rel. Furman v. Clute, 50 N. Y. 451, 10 Am. Rep. 508. The petitioner has called to our attention cases which hold that a vote is illegal and must be considered as a nullity in a count of the total number of votes cast, when the ballot is void because it fails to conform to the requirements of law. There is, however, a manifest distinction between a vote which is illegal because not cast by a qualified elector or because it is not in accordance with a statute regulating the exercise of the elective franchise, and a vote legal in form cast by a legal voter but for a person who is not eligible.

In our opinion the petitioner is not entitled to the writ of mandamus for the reason that he clearly was not elected to the office of sheriff of Providence county as by him alleged.

The hearing on this petition was had immediately before the holding of another grand committee called to fill said vacancy, after the failure to elect in the grand committee of January 18, 1918. We believed that the public interests required that the cause should be determined at that time before an extended opinion could be prepared, and after full consideration of the matter we denied the petition in a rescript. Because of the nature of the questions here we have considered it desirable that the reasons for our determination should be more fully stated in this opinion supplementing said rescript.

Annotation—Right of candidate receiving next highest number of votes where person receiving highest number is ineligible.

As to right of candidate receiving next highest number of votes where person receiving highest number died before election, see note to Patten v. Haselton, 51 L.R.A.(N.S.) 226.

The general rule stated in the earlier notes that, in order for one to be legally elected, he must receive a majority of the votes cast, and that the mere fact that the one receiving the highest number proves ineligible confers no right to the office on the one receiving the next highest, was adhered to in State ex rel. Spruill v. Bateman (1913) 162 N. C. 588, 77 S. E. 768, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 515, in which it was decided that, where the one receiving the highest number of votes for recorder of a court was ineligible, because not an attorney, the one receiving the next highest was not entitled to the office.

In Heald v. Payson (1913) 110 Me. 204, 85 Atl. 576, one receiving the next highest number of votes claimed that the person receiving a plurality of the votes was not lawfully nominated as a candidate, and that all votes cast for such person were null and void and should not have been counted for any purpose, and that consequently he, as the one receiving the next highest number of votes, received a plurality of all the votes that should be counted, and was elected. The court refused to so hold, stating that the person receiving the highest number was not ineligible, and that any voter who chose might have voted for him, and that there was nothing to show that the electors had any knowledge of any irregularity in the ballot. With respect to the general rule the court said: "It is fundamental that minorities cannot elect or rule. By the overwhelming weight of authority in this country, a candidate receiving less than a plurality of the votes cast is not elected, even if the opposing candidate receiving a plurality of the votes is ineligible. The votes cast for an ineligible candidate are at least so far effectual as to prevent the election of a candidate who received a less number of votes."

And in Woll v. Jensen (1917) 36 N. D. 250, 162 N. W. 403, it was held that one who received less than a majority of the votes cast for an office was not entitled to the office, although the voters knew of the disqualification of his opponent and chose to cast a majority of their votes for the latter. The court said: "It seems to be generally conceded that, where the voters do not know of the disqualification, the votes cast for the disqualified candidates cannot be credited to the defeated party, and that the whole election will be deemed a nullity. The only doubt in the minds of the writers has been whether this is true when the disqualification is known. The English rule and the rule of Indiana seem to be that, where the disqualification is known, the party receiving the minority vote will be entitled to the office, and this on the theory that the voters have wilfully thrown away their votes and that the office should not go begging on that account. The weight of American authority, both legislative and judicial, seems to be that no such intention to throw away the vote can be imputed, but that rather the vote for the disqualified candidate must be considered as a protest against the qualified person, and especially should this be the case where there are only two candidates. The authorities lay stress, indeed, upon the proposition that government by the majority seems to be an American maxim, and that no one should be deemed elected against the protest of that majority. It is true that many of the authorities are purely legislative. It is also true that perhaps in no adjudicated case has the question been fairly presented. The dicta of the courts, however, and the positive rulings of the legislative tribunals, are almost unanimous on the proposition that, where there is no statute declaring votes cast for ineligible candidates to be absolutely void, no right to the office can be presumed in the defeated candidate. We hold, therefore, that the plaintiff was not elected to the office."

The decision in SANDERS v. RICE, ante, 1153, is an interesting and important one. The court there held that votes cast by competent electors for a candidate claimed by political opponents to be ineligible, which claim was subsequently upheld by the courts, were not cast in "wilful defiance of law," so that they could not be counted in determining whether or not any candidate received a majority of the votes cast, and that one who received the minority vote was not entitled to be declared elected, where the Constitution required a majority of votes for election, although, as before stated, the majority candidate was ineligible to office.

The opinion was expressed in Cadle v. Baker (1915) 51 Mont. 176, 149 Pac. 960, where the Corrupt Practices Act was involved, that, in view of the constitutional provision that "the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of legal votes shall be declared elected," the legislature had no power to declare anyone elected to an office who had not received the highest number of votes. The court said: "In passing it is worthy of note that certain provisions of the Corrupt Practices Act appear to be in direct conflict with the state Constitution. In § 49 it is provided that if, upon an election contest, 'judgment or ouster against a defendant shall be rendered, said judgment shall award the nomination or office to the person receiving next the highest number of votes.' If by this provision is meant that a candidate who does not receive the highest number of legal votes may be declared elected, it would seem to be in hopeless conflict with the terms of § 13, article 9, of our state Constitution, which reads: 'In all elections held by the people under this Constitution, the person or persons who shall receive the highest number of legal votes shall be declared elected.' While a successful candidate may be deprived of the fruits of his victory by being required to forfeit his office as a punishment for wrongdoing, we undertake to say that it is beyond the lawmaking power to declare elected to an office anyone who has not received the highest number of legal votes therefor."

Holcomb, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

While respondent was lawfully incarcerated in the Thurston county jail in the custody of the sheriff and his deputies, on May 9, 1917, he was attacked, cut, and stabbed with a knife by a man named Reisch, then confined in the same jail and custody under the charge of insanity lodged against him by the county attorney on May 6, 1917. Reisch was delivered by the chief of police of Olympia into the custody of Gifford, deputy sheriff and jailer, during the absence of his principal, Sheriff McCorkle. During the three days Reisch was in jail prior to the affray, he was quiet and peaceable, and showed no signs of insanity, and the same was true during the preceding night while he was in custody of the chief of police. It appears that Reisch was not searched when taken into custody by the deputy sheriff, and when the affray took place he was found in possession of a knife with which he inflicted the injuries. Reisch was confined in the main room of the jail with Kusah and several others: The affray took place about 1 o'clock on the morning of May 9th. Respondent alleged in his complaint that he was stabbed by Reisch in the right arm at the elbow, with several other slight stabs, cuts, or scratches, and that the stab in the elbow caused the musculospiral nerve to be severed, which produced a paralysis of the wrist, causing the wrist to drop down, and the condition called "wrist drop."

The negligence charged by the complaint against the sheriff and his surety consisted of the sheriff's receiving into the jail where the respondent was kept a dangerously insane person, and carelessly and negligently placing the insane person in a cell occupied by respondent, and carelessness and negligence on the part of the sheriff in not searching the insane man and taking from him his weapons.

The sheriff, his surety, and Reisch, the insane man, were all sued by respondent, and the trial court gave appropriate instructions to the jury in order to separate the liability of the sheriff and his surety from that of the defendant Reisch. It is apparently conceded that Reisch, though insane, was liable for such tort as he was alleged to have committed upon the respondent in this case. The court so submitted the case to the jury, and we think properly. 14 R. C. L. 596, § 51.

Upon the submission of the case to the jury they attempted to return a remarkable series of verdicts. They first brought in a verdict for $1,000 in favor of respondent, segregating the same into a verdict for $500 against the bonding company, $400 against the sheriff, and $100 against Reisch. The court refusing to accept this verdict, after some explanation as to the meaning of the instructions separating the liability of the sheriff and the surety from that of defendant Reisch, they again deliberated and returned a verdict of $666.66 against the bonding company and $333.34 against McCorkle and Reisch, which verdict was also refused by the court. The jury were ordered to again deliberate, and thereafter they returned with a verdict of $1,000 against all of the appellants. This verdict was entered. Appellants moved for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and for a new trial, which were denied, and judgment was entered against appellants and each of them in the sum of $1,000. A motion had been made by appellants and each of them at the close of respondent's case to direct a verdict on any judgment for appellants, which was denied.

Appellants make the following claims of error: (1) That the verdict of the jury and the judgment thereon are not sustained by the evidence; (2) that the negligence, if any, was the contributory negligence of respondent; (3) that the injuries suffered by respondent, if any, resulted through the unauthorized act of a deputy in placing the insane suspect in jail and holding him there without a warrant or process, and without the knowledge of the sheriff, and as a consequence thereof no legal liability attaches to the defendant sheriff or his surety; (4) if an act of the deputy was an act within his official duties, it was one resting within his discretion, and the court is precluded from reviewing the discretionary action of the sheriff as to the manner of the performance. We shall discuss these contentions in reverse order.

The principal question to be determined is whether or not the sheriff is answerable civiliter for alleged negligence in the performance of his duty by himself or his deputy, in regard to the detention of the insane suspect and the manner of his custody and failure to search him upon receiving him. Our statute (§ 8499, Rem. Code) provides: "The sheriff, or in case of his death, removal, or disability, the person appointed by the law to supply his place, shall have charge of the county jail of his proper county and of all persons by law confined therein, and such sheriff or other officer is hereby required to conform in all respects to the rules and directions of said judge above specified, or which may from time to time by such judge be made and communicated to him by said commissioners."

Section 8500, Rem. Code, provides for the keeping of a jail register by the sheriff or other officer performing the duties of a sheriff, and among other things requires that the name of each prisoner, with the date and cause of his or her commitment, together with a list and value of property taken from such prisoner or delivered to the sheriff or other officer at the time of the commitment of such prisoner, shall be kept. Section 3990, Rem. Code, provides that the sheriff may provide as many deputies as he thinks proper, for whose official acts he shall be responsible to the amount of his bond, and may revoke such appointments at his pleasure, and persons may also be deputed by any sheriff in writing to do particular acts, and the sheriff shall be responsible on his official bond for the default or misconduct in office of his deputies.

These statutory provisions are but declaratory of the common law. 1 Bl. Com. 343; South v. Maryland, 18 How. 396, 15 L. ed 433; Ex parte Jenkins, 25 Ind. App. 532, 81 Am. St. Rep. 114, 58 N. E. 560; Indiana ex rel. Tyler v. Gobin (C. C.) 94 Fed. 48. In Ex parte Jenkins, 25 Ind. App. 532, 81 Am. St. Rep. 114, 58 N. E. 560, it was remarked: "It is unnecessary to cite authorities to the effect that when a sheriff takes property of any kind into his possession by virtue of a writ, he is bound to take ordinary care of the property and prevent its deterioration or destruction, and for a failure in this regard he is liable on his bond. There certainly can be no reason for saying that his duty as to care is not at least equally obligatory in respect of a prisoner who is in his custody by virtue of his office."

94 Fed. 48, Baker, J., said: "When a sheriff, by virtue of his office, has arrested and imprisoned a human being, he is bound to exercise ordinary and reasonable care, under the circumstances of each particular case, for the preservation of his life and health. This duty of care is one owing by him to the person in his custody by virtue of his office, and for a breach of such duty he and his sureties are responsible in damages on his official bond,"—citing authorities.

And, as further said in Ex parte Jenkins: "The sheriff of the county has the care and custody of prisoners committed to the county jail. The duty the sheriff owes to the state to keep a prisoner committed to his custody and deliver him over to the proper authority at the proper time is no more compulsory than is the duty he owes the prisoner himself to exercise reasonable and ordinary care to protect the prisoner's life and health. If he permits a prisoner to escape or to be taken from his custody the fault is prima facie his, and there has been prima facie a breach of official duty for which he is liable on his official bond."

Hence it is plain that the sheriff's duties in regard to prisoners or others in his lawful custody is twofold, one to the state to keep and produce the prisoner when required, and the other to the prisoner to keep him in health and safety. That has been declared by this court in McPhee v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. 52 Wash. 154, 21 L.R.A.(N.S.) 535, 132 Am. St. Rep. 958, 100 Pac. 174, and Riggs v. German, 81 Wash. 128, 142 Pac. 479.

In Riggs v. German it is also declared that a sheriff cannot be charged with negligence in failing to prevent what he could not reasonably anticipate, and that a sheriff should not be required, in the exercise of ordinary care, to maintain himself or deputy in the presence and company of his prisoners, unless the circumstances as developed by the testimony are such that it can be said that the sheriff had reasonable ground to apprehend the danger. So in the case at bar the question of whether the sheriff or his deputy was negligent in his manner of keeping the prisoners together in one common room in the jail depends upon a number of circumstances, among which was the question of what was safest and most humane for the prisoners; what was most conducive to their health, well-being, and safety; the character of the prisoners themselves, and their conduct; and possibly a number of other circumstances. The question of whether it was negligent not to search Reisch, an insane suspect, who was declared to be mild and inoffensive and showed no violent traits or tendencies, was also a question of fact to be determined under all the circumstances surrounding him, the complaint against him, and the manner of his custody. All these were questions of fact for the jury, and the court properly so considered, but possibly did not give sufficient instructions to the jury as to how to determine the negligence of the sheriff and his deputies from the facts existent.

Appellants contend that these acts or omissions of the sheriff and his deputy were matters of his discretion and of quasi judicial nature solely committed to him, and for such acts or omissions he is not answerable to another in any court. Emery v. Littlejohn, 83 Wash. 334, 145 Pac. 423, Ann. Cas. 1915D, 767, is cited as sustaining this contention. That case clearly does not sustain this contention. That was a case against the superintendent of an insane asylum in this state, and others, for the alleged negligence of the superintendent and his assistant in permitting a patient committed to their charge to be paroled and given over to the custody of the patient's relatives. There is a statute (Rem. Code, § 5967) providing that any patient may be discharged from the hospital when in the judgment of the superintendent it is expedient. It was therefore held that that statute gave authority to the superintendent to use his discretion generally and to finally discharge or temporarily parole patients committed to his custody.

In the case of the sheriff, both by statute and at common law, as we have seen, he owes the direct duty to a prisoner in his custody to keep him in health and free from harm, and for any breach of such duty resulting in injury he is liable to the prisoner, or, if he be dead, to those entitled to recover for his wrongful death. McPhee v. United States Fidelity & G. Co. supra; 25 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 676; 22 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 2d ed. 1306; 35 Cyc. 1942. If the sheriff is found guilty of such negligence, the surety on his bond would also be liable to the extent of the bond, for the bond is conditioned for the faithful performance of his duties.

The sheriff, being responsible for reasonable care in the selection of his deputies, is responsible also for the negligence of a deputy in the performance of his duty as such. The acts or omissions of Gifford as deputy were the acts or omissions of McCorkle as sheriff. Whether due and ordinary care was exercised in searching or omitting to search the insane suspect at the time and in the manner and under the circumstances in which he was brought to the custody of the sheriff and his deputy was a question of fact for the jury, to be determined in the light of all the facts and circumstances.

Neither can it be said, as urged under the third claim of appellants, that the injury, if any, resulted through the unauthorized act of a deputy in placing the insane suspect in jail, and holding him there without a warrant or process, and without the knowledge of the sheriff. The complaint filed by the prosecuting attorney was the only warrant required for the detention of the insane suspect. The suspect was being proceeded against in due form of law, and was delivered to the custody of the sheriff and his deputy for safe-keeping in order that he might be produced before an inquest of lunacy, or discharged. It was the duty of the sheriff, therefore, to keep the suspect safely until so produced or discharged.

It is urged by appellants that the negligence, if any, was the contributory negligence of respondent. This is based upon the fact that the respondent was shown to have had knowledge that Reisch was charged with insanity, and was detained as an insane suspect, and that, if he had any knife in his possession, being confined with respondent and the other prisoners together, respondent must have known of the possession of the knife by Reisch. We can see nothing in this contention, and think that merely to state it is to determine its fallacy. At any rate respondent's testimony was that he did not know that Reisch had a knife until the time of the affray. He certainly was not chargeable with knowledge of any negligence of the sheriff and his deputy in omitting to search and confining Reisch in the common room of the jail with him, for both he and Reisch were in the sole power of the sheriff and his deputy. It would certainly be an inhuman rule that would require any care and caution on the part of an inmate of a jail as to the performance or nonperformance of the duty of his keepers toward him.

As to the contention of appellants that the verdict of the jury and judgment are not sustained by the evidence, there are great grounds for discussion. Certain injuries were concededly inflicted upon respondent for which he was entitled to recover his actual loss occasioned thereby, if any, and his consequential damages, such as pain and suffering and loss of earning capacity. Under the evidence there was no immediate loss of money or property by reason of the injury. His bills for medical services and hospital were paid by the county, and he lost no time, for he was then lawfully confined in the county jail to await trial upon a criminal charge. The only real injury besides pain and suffering claimed by respondent was the wrist drop.

It appears undisputed by the evidence that neither at nor immediately after the conflict in the jail, nor for several days thereafter, did he make any complaint of injury in the nature of wrist drop. Several days after the injury he did claim that his hand was somewhat stiff; that when he attempted to straighten his fingers he found it hard to do so. But the evidence of all the physicians who testified in the case, except that of respondent's medical witness, was that wrist drop produced by the severing of the musculospiral nerve is a condition of the hand and arm whereby the control of the muscles is lost and the hand assumes a clawlike shape, with fingers and thumb drawn in. The wrist cannot be held up; the hand bends or lops forward at the wrist, and cannot be pronated or supinated, as the doctors say,—that is, cannot be turned back down or palm down. Doctors testified that it would be impossible to strike a punching blow; it would break the wrist if such condition existed and injure the striker more than the stricken. It would be impossible to use the hand in the operation of washing one's self. They also testified that wrist drop is so striking and serious and apparent an injury that it would be instantly perceptible; that it would occur instantly after the severing of the musculospiral nerve. None of this evidence is disputed by any medical witness for respondent. His one medical witness testified only that respondent came to him on June 4th, which was about four weeks after the conflict; that then he complained that he could not use his hand, and the doctor said that it was wrist drop. Appellants' medical witnesses testified that wrist drop can easily be and often is simulated. Respondent's medical witness did not see him until four weeks after the injury, when the wound had healed, and he could not then readily tell the nature of the wound, or whether it was in such location as to affect the musculospiral nerve. Appellants' medical witnesses, two of whom treated him within a half hour after the injury, testified that the stab wound in the elbow was a very shallow wound, cutting through the skin, but not through the subcutaneous tissue; that it did not penetrate the muscular tissue at all, and was from an inch to an inch and a half from the location of the musculospiral nerve; that the musculospiral nerve lies deep in the arm, and it would have required a wound of considerable depth in that location to have touched the nerve at all, but that the wound in question did not go anywhere near it. Respondent himself testified that he did not know he was wounded or out until his attention was later called to that fact by another prisoner who told him that his arm was bleeding. It is also indisputably shown that during the affray respondent struck Reisch a number of times, using both hands to do so, and knocking Reisch down several times; and, further, that immediately after the fight he washed his hands himself, using both hands to do so. This state of facts almost conclusively demonstrates that there was no injury to the musculospiral nerve, and no real wrist drop possible. Yet indisputably there was some injury and damage inflicted.

In view of the fact that the jury twice attempted to assess a larger verdict against the bonding company than against either the sheriff or Reisch, when the bonding company was liable only in case of the negligence of the sheriff, and only to the same extent, we are of the opinion that passion and prejudice on the part of the jury must be inferred.

As shown by the preceding discussion, we cannot hold as a matter of law that the sheriff is not liable for the negligence of himself and deputy, but it is a question of fact whether they were negligent. The right of recovery of any sum approaching $1,000, or the half of it, under the facts here, is doubtful at best. Under such conditions as are here shown, including the indicated passion and prejudice on the part of the jury, we think it would be unjust to hold any of the appellants foreclosed by the findings of the jury. In the furtherance of justice a new trial should be had.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Annotation—Civil liability of sheriff or other officer for injury inflicted by prisoner in his custody upon another prisoner.

Questions of collateral interest are treated in notes cited in the L.R.A. Indexes under the title, "Jails."

The general rule gathered from the cases which have considered the question under annotation is that, in order to hold L.R.A.1918C.

an officer in charge of a jail or prison liable for an injury inflicted upon one prisoner by another prisoner, there must be knowledge on the part of such officer that such injuries will be inflicted or good reason to anticipate danger thereof, and negligence in failing to prevent the injury.

Thus, a sheriff was held liable in Hixon v. Cupp (1897) 5 Okla. 545, 49 Pac. 927, for injuries inflicted on one confined in the jail by another inmate of the jail, in subjecting him to a penalty because of his refusal to pay a fine assessed by a "kangaroo court" established by the inmates. The decision as to liability was predicated upon the fact that "evidence was adduced to the jury to show that the sheriff knew that it was the custom of the prisoners confined in the jail under his charge to assault and beat prisoners brought to such jail, after pretended or mock trial, and that he failed to use such means as were at his command to prevent such act." The decision in this case was further based on the fact that by statute it was the sheriff's duty to keep the peace in the county, which included the jail.

On the other hand, in Riggs v. German (1914) 81 Wash. 128, 142 Pac. 479, although the sheriff knew of the existence of a "kangaroo court" in the jail, it was held that he was not liable for injuries inflicted upon a prisoner for reasons similar to those in the Cupp Case (Okla.) supra, as there was no evidence that the sheriff knew or had reason to know that the prisoners contemplated an assault upon the plaintiff, and that, having such knowledge, he took no steps to prevent it.

So, also, in Gunther v. Johnson (1899) 36 App. Div. 437, 55 N. Y. Supp. 869, it was held that the sheriff was not liable in damages for the death in a county jail of a prisoner who, having struck another prisoner during an altercation, was pursued and stabbed by the latter, the injuries resulting in his death. The basis of the decision was that there was no evidence to show that the sheriff knew of any trouble in the jail, or that he was bound to anticipate the attack by deceased or the subsequent felonious assault by the other prisoner; and that he could not be charged with negligence in failing to prevent what he could not reasonably anticipate; and consequently it could not be affirmed that he failed in his duty, or that he wilfully did something which resulted in the injury.

JACK DAVIS et al., Pliffs. in Err.,
v.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(247 Fed. 394.)

Criminal law — public trial — excluding spectators.

1. There is a denial of the public trial guaranteed by the Constitution, where, during the arguments to the jury, the court in a criminal case excludes from the court room all but relatives of defendants, members of the bar, and newspaper reporters, although considerable feeling had developed between partisans of defendants and state witnesses, and some witnesses were intoxicated.

For other cases, see Criminal Law, II. b, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — prejudice — necessity of showing.

2. Prejudice need not be shown to set aside a conviction where accused was denied the public trial guaranteed by the Constitution.

Per Curiam:

The only question in this case that merits discussion is whether the defendants, who were convicted of a crime against the United States, were given a public trial as required by the 6th Amendment to the Constitution.

Near the conclusion of the trial, which lasted several days, a night session of the court was held for the arguments to the jury. When the jurors were in the box, and just before the court convened, the court room, which had become crowded, was by the direction of the trial judge cleared of all spectators except relatives of the defendants, members of the bar, and newspaper reporters, and a bailiff at the door was instructed to admit none but those of the excepted classes. The bailiff thereafter admitted a few others, but it was by way of favor of the court officers. Some citizens against whom no objections appeared on account of character or condition afterwards sought and were denied admission. The seats in the audience part of the court room back of the bar rail would have accommodated at least 100 spectators. About 25 were allowed to be present. Within the rail, besides the court officials and the defendants, a couple of women relatives of the latter, a few newspaper men, and about 10 members of the bar were present. The reasons for the action of the court were these:

The crime of which defendants were charged had connection with a train robbery, and the trial, which was held at Muskogee, Oklahoma, excited more than ordinary interest. At previous sessions the court room was crowded with spectators, so much so that in one instance the court directed the bailiffs to clear the aisles so that witnesses would not be impeded when called. Considerable ill feeling had developed between the defendants, their relatives and friends, and some of the witnesses for the prosecution, and the court had placed the latter in the custody and care of an officer. Precautions had also been taken that defendants should come unarmed into the court room. On the evening of the night session an encounter occurred in a restaurant, in which a relative of one of the defendants hit a witness for the prosecution across the face with a newspaper. This was reported to the court; also that one or more of the witnesses in the court room were intoxicated. It does not appear that the court room was crowded beyond its seating capacity when the order to clear it was made, or that any person was making a disturbance or threatening to do so, or that there was any well-founded apprehension that a disturbance would occur.

We appreciate the better position of the trial court to appraise the significance of surrounding conditions, but we cannot avoid the conviction that it acted upon the representations of those who did not adequately realize the great importance of keeping a place where the justice of the nation is judicially administered a public place for the admission of peaceful citizens. An intoxicated man could have been excluded or removed; the aisles and passageways could have been kept clear; when the seats were filled, other spectators could have been denied at the door; if the noise in the lobbies interfered with the proceedings, the lobbies could have been cleared; and individuals whose conduct outside the court room made their presence within a menace might have been excluded. But it is quite a different thing to exclude the public generally, regardless of their conduct or character.

The 6th Amendment provides that "in all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a . . . public trial." The provision is one of the important safeguards that were soon deemed necessary to round out the Constitution, and it was due to the historical warnings of the evil practice of the Star Chamber in England. The corrective influence of public attendance at trials for crime was considered important to the liberty of the people, and it is only by steadily supporting the safeguard that it is kept from being undermined and finally destroyed. As the expression necessarily implies, a public trial is a trial at which the public is free to attend. It is not essential to the right of attendance that a person be a relative of the accused, an attorney, a witness, or a reporter for the press, nor can those classes be taken as the exclusive representatives of the public. Men may have no interest whatever in the trial, except to see how justice is done in the courts of their country. The qualifications of the broad scope of the constitutional provision and of like provisions in the Constitutions of the states are few, and are based upon considerations of public morals and peace and good order in the court rooms. They are definitely illustrated in cases in which the exclusion of some or all of the spectators has been upheld.

In Grimmett v. State, 22 Tex. App. 36, 58 Am. Rep. 630, 2 S. W. 631, the audience was temporarily excluded during the cross-examination of a young girl who was a witness in a trial for rape. The court certified that persons in the audience persisted by their laughter in disturbing the proceedings and embarrassing the witness, and it was impossible to distinguish them from the others.

People v. Kerrigan, 73 Cal. 222, 14 Pac. 849, was a case of violent and abusive conduct of the defendant, and disorder in the audience. The court room doors were not closed, and the defendant's friends and reporters were allowed to enter and leave at will.

In Benadict v. People, 23 Colo. 126, 46 Pac. 637, the trial involved a recital of disgusting details. Members of the bar, officers of the court, law students, and witnesses were allowed to remain.

State v. Nyhus, 19 N. D. 326, 27 L.R.A. (N.S.) 487, 124 N. W. 71, was a prosecution for the rape of a girl under fourteen years of age. The order excluding auditors excepted all jurors and litigants at the term, attorneys, witnesses for both parties, "and any other person or persons whom the several parties to the action may request to remain."

Reagan v. United States, 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583, 120 C. C. A. 627, 202 Fed. 488, was also a case of rape. Court officers, witnesses for both parties, and members of the bar were not excluded.

In State v. Callahan, 100 Minn. 63, 110 N. W. 342, during a part of the examination of the prosecutrix in a trial for rape, the court room was cleared of all persons excepting counsel, officers of the court, witnesses, and of course the defendant. The court held that, while a sweeping, unlimited order would have been erroneous, the situation was but temporary, and it appeared that the prosecutrix was so embarrassed by the crowd that counsel for the state was unable to elicit from her a definite statement of what occurred.

In Myers v. State, 97 Ga. 76, 25 S. E. 252, the court, in passing on defendant's complaint of an overcrowding of the court room, said that the requirement of a public trial did not prevent the exclusion of spectators for lack of seating capacity.

In Lide v. State, 138 Ala. 43, 31 So. 953, the clearing of the court room was because of applause by the spectators of remarks of counsel for the state. It was said: "It was not only the power, but the duty, of the court to prevent demonstrations of approval or disapproval by spectators in the trials of causes, and if need be to this end to exclude the offending parties from the courthouse."

In People v. Swafford, 65 Cal. 223, 3 Pac. 809, all persons were excluded except the judge, jurors, witnesses, and persons connected with the case. It was held that the word "public" in the Constitution was used in opposition to secret, and that defendant was not denied a public trial. This is an extreme case.

State v. Brooks, 92 Mo. 542, 5 S. W. 257, 330. In the early stages of the selection of the jury, bailiffs at the court room door refused to admit anyone except jurors, witnesses, officers of the court, and those having business in court. When the court was informed of this, it said it was without its direction, and it ordered that all persons be admitted until the seats were filled. It was held on appeal that this was not a denial of a public trial, but that there might have been ground for the complaint, had the order not been made, or had a request for a re-examination of the jurors questioned during the time been asked and denied.

745, the trial court, at the instance of the prosecuting attorney, requested ladies to leave the court room, as the attorney was about to refer to some evidence unfit for them to hear. This was held proper. The complaint, however, was not that defendant was denied a public trial.

The above are most of the cases in which limited admissions have been upheld. We turn now to those in which they have been disapproved.

In State v. Osborne, 54 Or. 289, 103 Pac. 62, 20 Ann. Cas. 627, the charge was rape. Before the taking of testimony the court directed the sheriff as follows: "You will please exclude everybody from the court room except the defendant, the attorneys engaged in the trial of this case, the jury, and officers of this court, and the witnesses while on the witness stand; and you will observe this order so to exclude the public from the court room during the taking of testimony upon this trial."

The carrying out of this order was vigorously condemned by the supreme court of the state. It will be observed that there was no selective exclusion with reasonable regard for the nature of particular phases of the trial or the testimony.

Tilton v. State, 5 Ga. App. 59, 62 S. E. 651, was a case of adultery with a fourteen-year old girl. The state Constitution required a public trial, and a state statute authorized trial courts to clear the court room of "all or any portion of the audience" in cases where the evidence "relates to improper acts of the sexes and tends to debauch the morals of the young." As soon as the jury was impaneled the court ordered "the court room cleared of everyone not connected with the case." It was held on appeal that the court might properly have excluded "all minors, all women, and all others who failed to behave decorously, or who interfered in any manner with the decent conduct of the case," but that its order was too sweeping and denied the defendant a public trial.

In State v. Hensley, 75 Ohio St. 255, 9 L.R.A. (N.S.) 277, 116 Am. St. Rep. 734, 79 N. E. 462, 9 Ann. Cas. 108, the trial was adjourned from a large court room to a small one for the taking of testimony of an immoral or obscene nature, and the court directed the sheriff to admit none but the jury, defendant's counsel, members of the bar, newspaper men, and a named witness for defendant. It was held that the exclusion was too general for a public trial.

In People v. Hartman, 103 Cal. 242, 42 Am. St. Rep. 108, 37 Pac. 153, the charge was assault with intent to commit rape. The action of the trial court in excluding all persons from the trial except the officers of the court and the defendant was said on appeal to be without justification in the law of modern times. The prior decision in People v. Swafford, supra, was held unsound. The court said: "The trial should be public in the ordinary common-sense acceptance of the term. The doors of the court room are expected to be kept open, the public are entitled to be admitted, and the trial is to be public in all respects, as we have before suggested, with due regard to the size of the court room, the conveniences of the court, the right to exclude objectionable characters and youth of tender years, and to do other things which may facilitate the proper conduct of the trial."

People v. Murray, 89 Mich. 276, 14 L.R.A. 809, 28 Am. St. Rep. 294, 50 N. W. 995, 9 Am. Crim. Rep. 719, was a case of murder. The attention of the trial court was directed to the fact that a policeman stationed at the court room door was denying admission to respectable citizens, but it refused to take action. It was shown by affidavits that there was ample accommodation in the court room, that but few were admitted, and that many were refused. The supreme court of Michigan held that defendant had not been accorded a public trial. It questioned whether respectability was a test of the right of access to a public trial, and, if so, whether it should be left to the knowledge or discretion of a police officer. After this decision was rendered a statute was enacted conferring discretion upon a trial judge to exclude from the trial, or any portion thereof, all persons "except those necessarily in attendance," whenever it appeared that "evidence of licentious, lascivi-ous, degrading, or peculiarly immoral acts or conduct" would probably be given.

In People v. Yeager, 113 Mich. 228, 71 N. W. 491, the defendant was charged with assault with intent to commit rape, and the trial court, in applying the above-mentioned statute, allowed representatives of the press to remain in the court room, asked all others to retire, and directed an officer to admit any who were relatives or friends of the defendant. It finally announced: "I have told the officer not to let anybody in here who is not either a friend of the complaining witness or of the defendant. He will ascertain that fact as they apply for admission. All such people will be admitted, and the public will be kept out." The supreme court of the state held the trial not a public one. It said: "Who is to decide who are the friends of the accused? The law makes no such test, but allows all citizens freely to attend upon any trial, whether civil or criminal."

We think these latter cases are well founded in principle and reason, and that in the case at bar the defendants did not have the public trial contemplated by the 6th Amendment.

It is urged that no prejudice to defendants was shown. A violation of the constitutional right necessarily implies prejudice, and more than that need not appear. Furthermore, it would be difficult, if not impossible, in such cases, for a defendant to point to any definite, personal injury. To require him to do so would impair or destroy the safeguard.

The sentences are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

Annotation—Right of court to exclude public from court room during criminal trial.

This note is supplemental to the notes in 9 L.R.A.(N.S.) 277; 27 L.R.A.(N.S.) 487; and 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 583, where the earlier cases are collected.

The courts continue to differ materially on the question.

It will be observed that the decision in DAVIS v. UNITED STATES, ante, 1164, seems opposed to the two rape cases below referred to, from the ninth circuit, of Reagan v. United States (1913) 44 L.R.A.(N.S.) 583, 120 C. C. A. 627, 202 Fed. 488, and Callahan v. United States (1917) 240 Fed. 683, the court in the DAVIS CASE not apparently distinguishing it on account of the trial being for a crime having connection with a train robbery.

In California, on a trial for incest with a daughter, it was held to be error I.R.A.1918C.

to require all persons other than those directly connected with the trial to withdraw from the court room, and to try the case "behind closed doors." People v. Letoile (1916) 31 Cal. App. 166, 159 Pac. 1059, where the court said: "We do not doubt the right of the court to regulate the admission of the public to the court room in any appropriate manner in order to prevent overcrowding or disorder, but the right does not exist to wholly exclude the public."

In State v. Keeler (1916) 52 Mont. 205, L.R.A.1916E, 472, 156 Pac. 1080, Ann. Cas. 1917E, 619, it was held that the constitutional right to a public trial was infringed by excluding from the court room in a rape case all not present when the order was made, and denying those who retired permission to return, except court officers, attorneys, doctors, and reporters.

In People v. Collazo (1913) 19 P. R. R. 912, it was held that the right of the accused to "a speedy and public trial" under the 6th Amendment to the United States Constitution and under the Porto Rico Code was infringed by excluding the public from the court room during the examination of one of the witnesses in a case for disturbing the public peace. The court said that the exclusion could not have been to prevent the public from hearing immoral testimony as other witnesses testified in the presence of the public regarding the same facts.

On the other hand, Reagan v. United States (Fed.) supra (to which the prior note in 44 L.R.A. (N.S.) 583, is attached), holding that the court might exclude the spectators in a rape case, was followed in Callahan v. United States (Fed.) supra, holding an order permissible in the discretion of the court, which excluded from the court room during the trial in a case of rape of a girl under the age of consent all persons who had no business before the court, but allowed to be present litigants, witnesses, jurors, counsel, officers of the court, and representatives of the newspapers.

In Keddington v. State (1918) — Ariz. —, 172 Pac. 273, it was held that the defendant's constitutional right to a public trial was not infringed where he was charged with contributing to the dependency of the girl of the age of sixteen years and the court directed that the court room be cleared and that the public be excluded except witnesses and relatives of the defendant and, by a modification, also newspaper reporters; but the court seems to have considered that the defendant was satisfied with the order after it had been modified by permitting the presence of newspaper reporters, and states that he made no objection or protest after such modification.

The exclusion from a trial for bastardy of all negroes and boys was held to be within the discretion of the trial judge in State v. Adams (1914) 100 S. C. 43, 84 S. E. 368.

The constitutional and statutory right to a "public trial" was held not to be infringed in a case of assault with intent to commit rape on an eleven-year-old daughter by an order excluding all spectators from the court room, in State v. Johnson (1914) 26 Idaho, 609, 144 Pac. 784, where the court said: "In cases like the one at bar, where the evidence is of a very immoral and disgusting nature, we do not think the court erred in excluding the general public from the court room during the trial. Of course, the friends of the defendant who desired to be present and the officers of the court, including members of the bar, ought not to be excluded; but to exclude the general public, who only have a curiosity to hear the revolting details of a rape case, does not deprive a defendant of a public trial as provided by the Constitution and statutes above cited."

There was held to be no infringement of the right to a public trial where, after some disorder in the court room, the court ordered the galleries to be cleared, and the bailiff removed most of the spectators and without any order locked the main door, which remained locked for some forty-five minutes, some persons meantime coming in through an anteroom, and the counsel of the defendant, while observing the situation, made no objection. People v. Tagwell (1917) 32 Cal. App. 520, 163 Pac. 508.

In the next two cases the element of consent was present, although the court in the second case did not think consent necessary.

It was held in a jurisdiction where the Constitution did not in terms provide that trials should be public, that a case of assault with intent to rape tried by consent by the court without a jury was properly tried in a smaller room than the usual court room, with the consent of the prisoner's attorney, in the presence of the officers, attorneys, and witnesses, it not appearing that anyone desired by the prisoner was excluded; but the conviction was reversed because the testimony of the prosecutrix was taken out of the presence of the prisoner. Dutton v. State (1914) 123 Md. 373, 91 Atl. 417, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 89.

A defendant on trial upon the charge of omitting to provide for an illegitimate child may have the spectators excluded. People v. Stanley (1917) 33 Cal. App. 624, 166 Pac. 596. In this case the request was made soon after the trial was opened, and was granted by the court. Near the close of the trial the request was renewed, and the court made the ruling hereafter set out, but the extent to which either order was enforced does not appear. The appellate court considered that the second order might have been properly made without the request of the defendant, it being as follows: "I will clear it of all except any persons who have any legiti-mate interest here. I am very much in sympathy with counsel's motion in so far as it has to do with a great many people who are attracted to the court room when cases of this character are on trial, not because they have any sort or kind of legitimate interest in the proceedings, not that they are concerned at all with the administration of public justice, but apparently simply and solely to gratify some sort of prurient curiosity or feeling or desire of some sort that finds great satisfaction in listening to testimony of the kind that is ordinarily adduced upon these hearings. If, upon the other hand, there are any persons here who are brought here because of any legitimate interest of any sort or kind in the case, or in any of those concerned with it, they may remain. For instance, if the defendant has here any personal friends or relatives, they may remain. If the complaining witness has any relatives or friends now here, they may remain. But the rest of the people here, who have no interest in this case, will kindly retire. Mr. McKenzie (counsel for the defendant): Your Honor, if that is going to include the friends of this complaining witness we assert our right to a public trial. The Court: No, you have already waived your right to a public trial; that waiver will stand. Mr. McKenzie: We meant the whole court room with the exception of the officers, and that is the motion we make. The Court: All right. I will stand on that. Mr. McKenzie: We ask that we have a public trial and we refuse to waive the right. The Court: The trial will proceed as already ordered."

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

KATHERINE KELLY

v.

CENTRAL UNION FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(101 Kan. 91, 165 Pac. 806.)

Appeal — effect of findings.

1. Rule followed that a general verdict and consistent findings of fact dispose of all controverted issues of fact when based upon substantial, though conflicting, testimony. For other cases, see Appeal and Error, VII. 1, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Evidence — sufficiency.

2. Record shows evidence sufficient to prove the contract in controversy, and to prove its authorization and ratification. For other cases, see Evidence, XII. 4, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Corporation — purchase of own stock.

3. A statute forbidding a corporation to purchase or hold its own stock, either absolutely or as collateral, after it has once been issued, does not cover the transactions of a corporation during its formative stage and before its corporate structure is perfected, in contracting for the surrender and cancellation of subscription stock to suppress an overissue in excess of its authorized capitalization, when such correction of the illegal overissue is done in good faith, free of any taint of fraud, and not in prejudice of the rights of third parties.

For other cases, see Corporations, IV. 4, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — ultra vires — benefit.

4. A corporation cannot avoid its obligation on a plea of ultra vires when it has appropriated the consideration and received the benefits of it, and where the party seeking to enforce it has fully performed her share of the bargain.

For other cases, see Corporations, IV. 4, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Same — oversale of stock.

5. Where a corporation in its formative stage discovers that it has oversold its authorized maximum capital stock, the fact that all stock sold after the maximum had been reached should have been treated as void will not bar a recovery for the agreed value or reasonable price of valid stock surrendered by a prior lawful subscribing stockholder to relieve the company's embarrassment and to extinguish the over-issue, when this method of correcting the company's capitalization is undertaken in good faith, free of any taint of fraud, and the rights of others are not affected thereby. For other cases, see Corporations, IV. 4, 2, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. H. L. Burgess, Hugh C. Smith, Paul E. Bradley, and Leslie J. Lyons, for appellant:

The statutes of the state of Missouri (Rev. Stat. 1909, § 7063) prohibit the purchase, directly or indirectly, by an insurance company organized in Missouri, of its own capital stock, and therefore the contract, if any, is absolutely void.

Messrs. Robert Stone and George T. McDermott also for appellant.

Messrs. Sheridan & Sheridan for appellee.

Dawson, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal relates to matters which transpired during the formative period of the defendant's corporate existence, and requires a review of certain transactions relating to plaintiff's purchase of subscription shares of defendant's stock, the surrender and cancellation of plaintiff's stock to extinguish an overissue of capital stock, the partial payment to plaintiff for her surrendered stock, and the question of the defendant's liability to plaintiff for the balance of the agreed price, or reasonable value, of plaintiff's stock thus surrendered by her.

Plaintiff's petition alleged that in July, 1911, she purchased from defendant 900 shares of its capital stock and paid for the same in money and property amounting to $11,250, and that she received a proper stock certificate therefor; that about December 31, 1911, defendant discovered that it had overissued its capital stock to the number of some 1,500 shares in excess of its authorized capitalization; that its authorized capital was $350,000, being 35,000 shares at a par value of $10 per share; and that it was necessary that some of the stock thus issued be canceled so as to reduce the actual stock issue to its maximum legal limit. The petition continues: "Such overissue of the stock having occurred through an inadvertence in having agents at various sections of the country taking subscriptions for and selling the stock. . . . But when it became apparent to the defendant company, and its various officers, of the said overissue of stock, and that it was necessary to call in and cancel about 1,500 shares of the stock so issued, thereupon the defendant, because of the foregoing, and in its effort to retire or cancel stock, . . . under an oral agreement on or about December 31, 1911, . . . in consideration that this plaintiff would return the said certificate and permit it to be canceled by the defendant, . . . it was at that time agreed between the defendant and the plaintiff that it would pay to the plaintiff the sum or $15 per share, or a total consideration of $13,500, for the said certificate of stock, . . . and the defendant, in pursuance thereof, at or about that time, received the same, and caused the same to be canceled. . . . That the defendant paid to this plaintiff, on or about the ——— day of June, 1912, $6,000, under the terms of the said oral agreement; and L.R.A.1918C.

that it has at all times since wholly refused and neglected to pay this plaintiff the remaining part of the said $13,500, which it agreed to pay, etc."

Defendant's answer denied, generally and specially, all of the plaintiff's material allegations, denied that there was an overissue of its capital stock at any time, denied that it was necessary to cancel any stock, denied that it purchased or canceled plaintiff's stock, denied that it paid her $6,000 thereon.

"But if said stock was purchased, as alleged, from the plaintiff herein, . . . said contract and agreement was entered into, if at all, in the state of Missouri. That it was to be performed within the state of Missouri. That the defendant is an insurance company, organized under the laws of the state of Missouri. . . . That § 7063 of the Revised Statutes of the state of Missouri for the year of 1909, among other things, provides as follows: 'No insurance company shall, directly or indirectly, purchase or hold, either absolutely or as collateral, its own stock, after the same has been once issued.' . . . That said alleged contract for the purchase of said stock, if made at all (and defendant denies that any such agreement was made), was contrary to said statute of the state of Missouri, and was therefore ultra vires, void, and of no force or effect, and not binding upon the defendant company."

Answering further, the defendant alleged that from the spring of 1910 until August 8, 1911, the plaintiff's husband, T. T. Kelly, was secretary of the defendant company, and as such official he had charge of the promotion and organization of the company and the sale of its capital stock: that after August 8, 1911, he was the president and a director of the company, and was the principal officer and manager of the company, and intrusted with its management and with control of its affairs; that on June 2, 1911, he caused a certificate for 1,000 shares of the stock to be issued to himself; that on July 20, 1911, he caused that certificate to be canceled, and in lieu thereof caused the issue of two certificates to be made, one for 100 shares in his own behalf and another for 900 shares to be issued to plaintiff; and that thereafter, through the company's stock salesman, he effected a sale of 1,000 shares to a Dr. J. M. Singleton for the sum of $15,000, being $15 per share.

"Said salesman in selling said stock to Dr. J. M. Singleton supposed that they were selling treasury stock of said company, but that said Kelly upon his own initiative, and without the knowledge or consent of defendant company, for the purpose of making a personal profit for himself, caused the two certificates of stock then held by himself and his wife . . . to be surrendered and transferred upon the books of the defendant company, and a new certificate . . . for one thousand shares to be issued to Dr. J. M. Singleton. . . ."

The gist of other matters pleaded in the answer was that the Singleton stock was an outright purchase of the stock of plaintiff and her husband, and not a purchase of treasury stock; that Singleton paid for his stock by giving promissory notes for the purchase price; that plaintiff's husband, as president of the company, made a real estate loan to Singleton, with defendant's funds, upon condition that one of the promissory notes for $7,500 given by Singleton should be paid with the moneys thus loaned to him; and that, pursuant thereto, plaintiff's husband received the sum of $7,500.

"That this defendant has never exercised dominion or ownership of said notes, or either of them, and has never made any claim to or over the said notes, and it does not now claim any right, title, or interest thereto. That said notes have never been listed or scheduled among the assets or property of the defendant company, but at all times have been and now are in truth and in fact the property of the said T. T. Kelly."

Plaintiff's reply admitted that originally a certificate of stock in the name of her husband for 1,000 shares had been prepared, but never with her consent; that two certificates should have been prepared in the first instance, one representing her interest of 900 shares and one representing her husband's interest of 100 shares; that, when the overissue was discovered, her husband, as president of the company, offered to return to her the money and property (mortgages) which she had paid for her stock and pay her the balance of the then reasonable and agreed price, or, if the property could not be returned, the defendant would pay her $15 per share. Other features of the plaintiff's reply read:

"That thereupon she surrendered the said certificate of stock, first indorsing it, and delivered it to T. T. Kelly, for the defendant company at Paola, Kansas, on or about the latter part of December, 1911, or the fore part of January, 1912, and that thereafter the defendant has kept and retained the said certificate and has not paid to this plaintiff any of the said purchase price, except the sum as stated in plaintiff's petition.

"Third. This plaintiff admits that T. T. Kelly is, and has been for many years, the husband of the plaintiff, and that he was the secretary of the defendant company as well as the president of the defendant company. L.R.A.1918C.

pany; that he had all the power and authority in behalf of the defendant expressed in the petition of the plaintiff; and further alleges that each and all of his acts and proceedings with relation to the defendant and in reference to the stock of this plaintiff and the surrender thereof were from time to time fully known and approved and ratified by the board of directors, stockholders, and the executive committee of the defendant, including the various officers of the defendant; and that the defendant and its said board and officers and the committees acquiesced in, approved, and consented, and had previously authorized, the procurement of the said certificate of stock by the said T. T. Kelly from this plaintiff. . . ."

On these issues, the cause was tried. The jury returned a general verdict for plaintiff, and answered certain special questions propounded by plaintiff.

"(2) . . . State if the plaintiff, at the instance and request of the defendant, caused the said stock certificate to be delivered to the defendant with the intention and purpose on the part of the defendant and plaintiff that the defendant would cancel the said stock certificate and the rights of the plaintiff as the holder of such stock. A. Yes.

"(3) . . . State if the defendant did cancel the said certificate and thereafter exercised absolute control over the said stock. A. Yes.

"(4) . . . State if it is true that, at the time the defendant so received the said certificate, it did so with the belief on its part that there was an overissue of stock of the defendant, and that it was necessary to procure at least as much as 900 shares, in order to cancel the same to reduce the stock issue of the defendant to 35,000 shares. A. Yes.

"(5) . . . State if the defendant at that time agreed to pay the plaintiff for the said stock, and, if so, the price of $13,500. A. Yes.

"(6) . . . What was the reasonable market value of the 900 shares of stock represented by the certificate of the plaintiff, at the time it was so delivered to the defendant? A. $15 per share, or $13,500.

"(7) How much did the plaintiff cause to be paid to the defendant for the 900 shares represented by her certificate No. 488? A. $12.50 per share, or $11,250.

"(8) Was there, at the time the defendant received the certificate of stock in question, an overissue of stock of defendant? A. Yes."

Also certain questions of defendant:

"(3) Did the plaintiff in this action receive the check for $7,500 issued by the Central Union Fire Insurance Company to Henrie S. Dyson, given by Dr. J. M. Singleton in payment of one of his notes? A. Yes, she received the check.

"(4) Was said $7,500 received by plaintiff and applied by her in part payment for her 900 shares of stock? A. $6,000 was applied on her 900 shares of stock."

Defendant's principal contentions are that the contract for the surrender and cancellation of plaintiff's stock was in violation of the laws of Missouri and prohibited by Missouri statutes, and that the laws of a corporation's domicile follow and govern its conduct into whatever jurisdictions the corporation may go; that the contract was also void under the laws of Kansas; that no contract was proven and no ratification shown; that, if there was an overissue of defendant's stock, the plaintiff's stock would not be affected thereby, but only the Singleton stock, or whatever stock was issued after the authorized capitalization was sold in full; that the holders of the excess issue of stock had their remedy against the corporation by demanding a return of the consideration paid for the excess issue; that defendant's acquisition of plaintiff's stock did not change the situation or cure the defect in the capitalization; that the verdict was excessive in the principal sum of $1,500 and interest computed thereon.

The general verdict and the special findings dispose of all controverted issues of fact. Although stoutly controverted by defendant, we find no difficulty in gleaning from the record ample evidence to prove the contract, its authorization, and ratification. Getty v. C. R. Barnes Mill. Co. 40 Kan. 281, 287, 19 Pac. 617; Sherman Center Town Co. v. Morris, 43 Kan. 282, 284, 19 Am. St. Rep. 134, 23 Pac. 569. There was, indeed, much evidence to the contrary. A skilful and persistent effort was made to prove that the cancellation of plaintiff's stock was merely to effect a sale and transfer of it to Dr. Singleton, and not at all to cure an overissue. But the jury has settled these matters. Brington v. Wagoner, 100 Kan. 10, 164 Pac. 1057, syl. ¶ 1.

Statutes of Missouri, Missouri decisions, and Kansas decisions are cited and quoted to show that the contract for the surrender and cancellation of plaintiff's stock to correct and cure the overissue was ultra vires and expressly prohibited, and that the contract was against public policy. These have been carefully examined. The Missouri statute forbids a corporation to purchase or hold its own stock, either absolutely or as collateral, after it has once been issued. 2 Mo. Rev. Stat. 1909, § 7063; Chrisman-Sawyer Bkg. Co. v. Independence Mfg. Co. 168 Mo. 645, 647, 68 S. W. 1026. Such is L.R.A.1918C.

the general rule. Whether the purchase of its own stock by a corporation is positively forbidden by statute or by mere judicial disapproval of such a practice, there is no doubt that the rule is based on sound public policy. German Sav. Bank v. Wulfekuhler, 19 Kan. 60; Abeles v. Cochran, 22 Kan. 405, 31 Am. Rep. 194; Steele v. Farmers & M. Mut. Teleph. Assn. 95 Kan. 580, 148 Pac. 661. There is usually some leeway allowed by statute, or by judicial interpretation, for a corporation's temporary acquisition or control of its own outstanding capital stock for the purpose of protecting itself against loss. U. S. Rev. Stat. § 5201, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 9762; Gen. Stat. 1915, § 2144; Mo. Rev. Stat. § 2990; Batley v. Eureka Bank, 62 Kan. 384, 63 Pac. 437; Faulkner v. Topeka Bank, 77 Kan. 385, 94 Pac. 153; Abilene State Bank v. Strachan, 89 Kan. 577, 46 L.R.A. (N.S.) 668, 132 Pac. 200; St. Louis Rawhide Co. v. Hill, 72 Mo. App. 142, syl. ¶ 2. See also notes in 61 L.R.A. 621, and 25 L.R.A. (N.S.) 50.

But the transaction involved in the present case is unique. The corporation's purpose in procuring plaintiff's stock and canceling it was to correct a breach of its corporate powers which it had already committed, and it was not to reduce or hold within its own control its legitimate capital, nor to commit a breach of any rule of public policy governing the manipulation of its own stock. The corporation had illegally issued stock in excess of its authorized maximum capital. Some mode of correction had to be devised. It was necessary that a report of its corporate financial status be made to the Missouri superintendent of insurance. To apprise that officer of the excess issue of stock at that time might have brought down on the corporation the drastic consequences of usurping illegal powers. The predicament of the corporation was not one which could be corrected by an amendment to its charter. The statute relating to that subject (Mo. Rev. Stat. § 7001a; Mo. Laws 1911, p. 276) regulates the reduction of a previously authorized and valid capitalization and provides for the amendment of the corporate charter in accordance therewith. That statute does not pretend to govern the suppression or extinguishment of an illegal overissue of stock. It cannot be denied that the defendant corporation had power to correct the infirmity in its capitalization. It was its duty to do so. When the state creates a corporation, it not only confers authority upon it, but it imposes a duty upon it,—the duty to exercise its corporate functions and to exercise them in conformity to its grant of powers. This corporation had erred, and it was bound to correct that error in some appropriate way. The mode of relieving itself from its predicament was simple, and not seriously inappropriate. It certainly was a harmless mode of correcting the irregularity. It did not prejudice the rights of creditors. It was not done to escape a stockholder's liability. It had no taint of fraud. Defendant's bargain with plaintiff for the surrender and cancellation of her stock to cure the illegal overissue was not such a purchase of plaintiff's stock as is contemplated by the inhibitions of the Missouri statute, and the bargain by which defendant was relieved of its embarrassment did not offend against any rational rule of public policy. It does not appear that the creator of this corporation, the state of Missouri, has challenged the corporate acts of defendant in effecting the readjustment and correction of its stock issue. The defendant was vitally benefited by the arrangement—not necessarily in money, but in a more important way—by the restoration of its corporate integrity. The court is of opinion that the transaction involved here was not within the fair intentment of the statute cited, and did not offend against it either in letter or in spirit.

There are, indeed, two schools of jurists and two lines of authority on legal questions relating to ultra vires transactions. The case of Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123, discusses at length both the strict and the liberal view concerning the consequences of ultra vires transactions. A long line of well-considered decisions has committed this court to the liberal view that a corporation may not avoid its obligation on a plea of ultra vires when it has appropriated the consideration or received the benefits of it, and when the party seeking to enforce the obligation has fully performed his share of the undertaking. Cooper v. First Nat. Bank, 40 Kan. 5, 18 Pac. 937; Sherman Center Town Co. v. Morris, 43 Kan. 282, 19 Am. St. Rep. 134, 23 Pac. 569; Sherman Center Town Co. v. Russell, 46 Kan. 382, 26 Pac. 715; Arkansas Valley Town & Land Co. v. Lincoln, 56 Kan. 145, 42 Pac. 706; Alexandria, A. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 58 Kan. 175, 48 Pac. 847; Blue Rapids Opera-House Co. v. Mercantile Bldg. & L. Asso. 101 Kan. 76, 53 Pac. 761; Harris v. Independence Gas Co. 76 Kan. 750, 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1171, 92 Pac. 1123; Saylors v. State Bank, 99 Kan. 515, 519, 520, 163 Pac. 454, and cases cited; First Nat. Bank v. Wilson, 101 Kan. 72, 165 Pac. 859; Main v. Casserly, 67 Cal. 127, 7 Pac. 426; 10 Cyc. 1056-1067; 7 R. C. L. 677-681.

It is suggested that the plaintiff's stock, being subscribed and paid for and issued before the excess issue occurred, was not L.R.A.1918C.

affected by the overissue; and that the stock sold and issued after the authorized capitalization was completed was void. That is true. The plaintiff might have stood on her rights and held her valid stock, and let the defendant settle with Singleton, the last subscriber, or one of the last, on the best terms possible. Singleton was very much desired as a stockholder and as a director, and the promoters of the corporation believed it to be very much to the corporation's advantage to have him interested in its success. In the formative stages of a corporation's development, considerable bona fide discretion must be allowed to its promoters to effect its success, and the wise apportionment of its stock and unselfish concessions of stock distribution by promoters to invoke and attach the interest of other influential and responsible parties, free of any taint of fraud or prejudice of third parties, are worthy of commendation rather than condemnation. Be that as it may, it would never do to deny redress to plaintiff, who parted with her stock to favor and benefit the defendant and to relieve it from its dilemma, merely because as lawyers and judges we happen to know that there was another and more strictly regular mode by which the corporation might have dealt with its overissue.

It needs but a word to dispose of the question relating to the excessive verdict. The plaintiff and her husband surrendered their stock as a part of the arrangement to extinguish the overissue. She received $7,500, of which $6,000 was a payment on her own stock, and $1,500 was to pay for her husband's stock. That matter was perfectly clear to the trial court and jury, and it is clear to us. The defendant owed her for the balance of the agreed price,—or the balance of the reasonable worth of the surrendered stock, which in this case amounted to the same thing,—and the verdict for that amount and interest is not excessive.

The judgment is affirmed.

A petition for rehearing having been granted, Marshall, J., on November 10, 1917, handed down the following additional opinion (101 Kan. 636, 168 Pac. 686):

An opinion in this case is reported in Kelly v. Central Union F. Ins. Co. 101 Kan. 91, ante, 1170, 165 Pac. 806. After that opinion had been rendered, a rehearing was granted. The cause has been reargued, and the original abstract and briefs have been re-examined. Additional briefs have been filed, and these briefs have been examined. Every principle of law announced in the former opinion has been reconsidered. The court is satisfied with that opinion and adheres to it.

A new question is now presented. The action was commenced in the district court of Miami county, and, on the application of the defendant, was removed from that court to the Federal court. Thereafter certain correspondence took place between the insurance department of this state and the defendant, in which correspondence the department strongly recommended that the removal of the cause from the state courts be abandoned. On that recommendation a stipulation was signed on which the Federal court remanded the cause to the state court for trial. The defendant contends that the stipulation on which the action was remanded from the Federal court was obtained by threats and duress, and that the action is still pending in the Federal court, and that, therefore, this court is without jurisdiction to hear this appeal. This matter was not presented to the trial court. It was first brought to the attention of this court by the petition for a rehearing. In that petition the defendant set out the correspondence between it and the insurance department. The petition for the removal of the cause to the Federal court, and the order of that court remanding the cause to the state court for trial, are set out in an additional abstract of the record, which has been filed since the cause was set down for rehearing in this court. The correspondence between the defendant and the insurance department does not appear in any abstract. It nowhere appears that the attention of the district court was in any way called to the matter that is now under consideration. This court has often said that it will not consider questions presented for the first time on appeal. Sleeper v. Bullen, 6 Kan. 303; Stewart v. Murphy, 95 Kan. 425, 148 Pac. 609, Ann. Cas. 1917C, 612; Hennerich v. Snyder, 101 Kan. 403, 168 Pac. 313; and numerous other decisions by this court. One reason for this rule is that appeals must be determined on the record coming from trial courts. Root v. Topeka R. Co. 98 Kan. 694, 153 Pac. 550; Girten v. National Zinc Co. 98 Kan. 405, 408, 158 Pac. 33.

The judgment is affirmed.

Woolley, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The matter here involved was brought before the district court on petition to review an order of a referee refusing confirmation of a sale in bankruptcy on the ground of gross inadequacy of price. The court affirmed the order. Its decision is now before us for review and revision. Bankruptcy Act, § 24b (Comp. St. 1916, § 9608).

Pursuant to an order of the referee, the trustee offered at public sale, subject to confirmation, the property of the bankrupt, consisting of real estate, machinery, equipment, and merchandise theretofore used in the bankrupt's business of hat manufacturer. The real estate was encumbered by a first mortgage for $9,000 and by a second mortgage for $58,000, given to secure an issue of bonds. The latter mortgage purported to be a lien also upon the personal estate. Conceiving that the liens upon the two classes of property required that property be sold separately in order to avoid confusion in the application of proceeds (the property being offered free of liens), the trustee declined to sell the property in bulk as a going concern, but sold it in separate parcels on different days.

The trustee reported that Lazar Jacobson had bid $19,000 for the realty and Herman Gold $7,600 for the personalty; that these were the highest bids; and recommended the confirmation of the sale.

Confirmation was opposed by Louis Kamm, an unsuccessful bidder, and by sundry unsecured creditors. Kamm's complaint was that he was forced to bid low because the property was offered in two parcels, realty and personalty; that he had no use for one without the other; that had the property been offered in bulk as a going concern, he would have bid and was still ready to bid a sum larger than the aggregate of the highest bids received. The creditors' objection to confirmation was that the property was sold for a grossly inadequate price.

Upon the question of inadequacy of price no evidence was produced. The creditors cited the appraisement, and the referee, relying upon it as evidence of value, was manifestly influenced in his conclusion by the great disparity between the valuations there made and the prices bid. The personal property was appraised at $31,212.20 and was sold for $7,600; the real property was appraised at $34,350 and was sold for $10,900.

Notwithstanding this disparity, the referee was not inclined to let go the bids at the first sale without first making sure of equally good bids at a second. To meet this situation the objecting bidder proposed giving a bond to insure that at a second sale the property would bring $2,500 more than the amount brought at the first, and the objecting creditors similarly offered a bond that the amount obtained at the second sale would be at least $1,500 more than that obtained at the first, provided that the property, after being offered in parcels, be offered as a whole. These tenders were accepted by the referee, the sale set aside (conditioned upon filing the bonds) and another sale ordered. On review the district court affirmed the order of the referee. This action of the court is the matter before us for revision.

The principal question, of course, is whether the trial court exercised a proper discretion in affirming the order setting aside the sale. But in this question are involved separate and conflicting rights of perhaps three classes of persons, (1) the low bidder, (2) the high bidders, and (3) creditors.

We may lay aside any claim of right made by the low bidder to have the sale set aside in order to give him another chance to bid. There was no irregularity in the sale. He simply complains that he would have bid higher if the property had been offered in a different way. The trustee offered the property in conformity with the order of sale, and, as there is nothing to show either in the order of sale or in the manner in which the trustee executed it that the low bidder was injuriously affected, he is without right to oppose confirmation. Re Burr Mfg. & Supply Co. 133 C. C. A. 126, 217 Fed. 19.

The high bidders, however, have a standing which permits them to appear and urge the acceptance of their bids and the confirmation of the sale. They were brought to the sale by invitation of the court, and, having done what the court asked them to do, they now have a right to ask the court to approve their acts.

Their right to be heard is based upon still another consideration. Judicial sales are an indispensable part of the machinery employed in administering bankrupt estates. Public policy requires stability in such sales. The Ruby (D. C.) 38 Fed. 622; Re Burr Mfg. & Supply Co. supra. To induce bidding at such sales and reliance upon them, the purpose of the law is that they shall be final. Pewabic Min. Co. v. Mason, 145 U. S. 349, 356, 36 L. ed. 732, 734, 12 Sup. Ct. Rep. 887. They are not to be disturbed except for substantial reasons.

After much experience in scrutinizing bidding at judicial sales, courts now uniformly hold that the mere offer to pay more than the price bid is not a substantial ground for setting aside a sale, recognizing that nothing will more certainly tend to discourage and prevent bidding than a judicial determination that the highest bidder may be deprived of the advantage of his accepted bid by an offer of another person, subsequently made, to bid higher on resale. Morrisse v. Inglis, 46 N. J. Eq. 306, 19 Atl. 16; Re Metallic Specialty Mfg. Co. (D. C.) 193 Fed. 300; Re Shapiro (D. C.) 154 Fed. 673.

While such are the rights of successful bidders and while the policy of the law favors them as against lower bidders who attempt to overthrow them, their rights, however, are not superior to the right of creditors not to be deprived of their security at prices which are grossly inadequate. Therefore the issue in this case is not between the low and the high bidders, but is between the high bidders and creditors,—parties with equal standing,—and the issue is not whether the court exercised a valid discretion in ordering a second sale on a tender of a higher bid, but is whether it abused its discretion in setting aside the first sale on the ground that the bids were grossly inadequate.

The rule is that mere inadequacy of price is not a sufficient ground for setting aside a judicial sale; but when the inadequacy is so great as in itself to raise a presumption of fraud or to shock the conscience of the court, it becomes gross inadequacy, and is a sufficient ground. Re Burr Mfg. & Supply Co. 133 C. C. A. 126, 217 Fed. 21; Cowen v. Stevens, 3 Harr. (Del.) 494; Oldham v. Hossenger, 5 Houst. (Del.) 434; Broomall v. Reybold, 5 Houst. (Del.) 435; Roger v. Ocheltree, 4 Houst. (Del.) 452.

When in a given case a price is grossly inadequate, and when upon that ground confirmation should be refused are matters within the judgment and discretion of the tribunal ordering the sale. When a trial tribunal orders a judicial sale subject to its confirmation under authority expressly requiring of it the exercise of discretion in approving or setting aside the sale (Bankruptcy Act, § 70b), an appellate tribunal will not reverse its discretion by substituting its own, nor will it otherwise disturb or interfere with its exercise so long as it does not amount to an abuse of discretion. Re Shea, 61 C. C. A. 219, 126 Fed. 153. In the exercise of this discretion the trial court in this case found that the prices bid were grossly inadequate. It based its judgment, as we read the record, not on the difference between the bids made at the first sale and the bid offered to be made at a second, but upon the disparity between the prices bid and the property valuations made by the appraisement. Had the court refused confirmation of the sale upon a finding of an inadequate price, based upon the difference between the bids made and the bid proposed, it would have exercised a discretion of doubtful validity. Morrisse v. Inglis; Re Metallic Specialty Mfg. Co.; and Re Shapiro, supra. But having found gross inadequacy of price in the disparity between the bid and the appraisement, we cannot say that the discretion of the court was improvidently exercised,—if based upon evidence. As nothing was before the court showing the value of the property except the appraisement, the remaining question is whether the appraisement is evidence upon which the court may base a valid discretion.

An appraisal in bankruptcy is an estimate of the value of the bankrupt estate made by three disinterested persons. The appraisers are officers of the court and are selected with an especial regard to their fitness to give an opinion upon the value of the particular property comprising the estate. In the case under consideration the kind of property appraised was a hat manufactory and merchandise. Two of the appraisers were men of long experience and high standing in that business. The appraisal, therefore, is the value data upon which the court subsequently acts in disposing of the bankrupt's property. To obtain such data the statute provides (§ 70b) that "all real and personal property belonging to bankrupt estates shall be appraised." Certainly this means that the property shall be appraised before it is sold, and as it is provided in the same section that property "shall not be sold otherwise than subject to the approval of the court for less than seventy-five per centum of its appraised value," the statute connects the appraisal with the sale, and plainly intends that the value of the property as appraised shall have a bearing upon and a relation to the price at which the court, in the exercise of its discretion, shall confirm to set aside the sale.

The sale in this case was made subject to confirmation, as shown by the terms of the order, and was conducted under authority of the provision which requires confirmation by the court when the property is sold for less than 75 per centum of its appraised value. As the provision conferring upon the court authority to confirm the sale declares that that authority shall be exercised when the price bid has a given relation to the value appraised, it is clear to us that the statute intends that the appraisal shall be employed by the court as a guide in the exercise of its discretion. When the purchase price approaches the appraised value, it leads the judgment of the court in one direction; when the disparity between the purchase price and the appraised value is so great as to suggest fraud or to shock the conscience of the court, then it directs the court's judgment in another direction. The appraisal thus becomes evidence of value. It is not conclusive evidence, to be sure, nor does it speak absolute verity, but it is provided for the court's use, and the court may rely upon it alone or may rely upon it partially, or may look beyond it to other evidence in ascertaining the real value, as in an exceptional instance where a sale was set aside on a bid equal to the appraisal and a second sale ordered, on proof that the property was worth and would bring three times the appraised value. Re Shea, supra.

We are of opinion that the appraisement is evidence upon which the court may base a valid discretion when called upon to confirm or set aside a trustee's sale.

It is further contended in this case that the care exercised by the court to secure as good a bid at the second sale as was obtained at the first shows that the court's discretion was swayed, if not determined, not by the disparity between the bid obtained and the appraised value, but by the small difference between the bids made at the first sale and the bid offered to be made at a second. We are not of this view. Inadequacy of the price bid at the first sale, and the terms under which the first sale was set aside and a second sale ordered, are matters separate and distinct. Having found gross inadequacy of the price bid at the first sale, the court might validly set aside that sale on that ground and at the same time make an order for a second sale, conditioned upon terms that would secure to the estate whatever advantage it derived from the bids at the first sale. These terms are considerations which have to do with a new sale ordered, and have no relation to the discretion exercised in setting aside the first sale.

The decree below is affirmed.

Annotation—Right of bidder at judicial sale to be heard upon question of its confirmation.

There is very little direct authority upon the right of a bidder at a judicial sale to appear and be heard upon the question of the confirmation of the sale. It seems clear that the successful bidder, that is, the one to whom the property is struck off, has, as held in JACOBSON v. LARKEY, ante, 1176, the right to appear in the confirmation proceedings and be heard therein. And this is the holding of the few cases that have passed directly upon this question.<sup>1</sup> In fact, a purchaser who has bid off the land and paid his money has been held to have a right to present his cause to the court although the sale has not been <sup>1</sup> George v. Norwood (1905) 77 Ark. 216, 113 Am. St. Rep. 143, 91 S. W. 557, 7 Ann. Cas. 171, holding that, where a judicial sale is regularly made in accordance with the order of the court and is free from fraud or misconduct, and the evidence shows that the price bid was not inadequate, the court will not refuse to confirm the sale because another offers a higher price, and that the purchaser has the right to insist upon a confirmation of the sale according to this fixed rule.

In Wise v. Wolf (1905) 120 Ky. 263, 85 S. W. 1191, it is stated that, while the rule reported.<sup>2</sup> It is stated that there can be no objection to the proposed purchaser presenting the matter of confirmation to the court by a petition, for the purpose of calling the court's attention to the status of the case; that "it is true, a purchaser or intending purchaser does not, until a report is made by the clerk, become a party to the cause, and does not acquire a right to have confirmation as, if the price and terms are such as the court ought to accept, he would have after report made; but the fact that he has made his bid and paid his money gives him a status, and justifies the court in entertaining his petition as that of one interested in the cause, and in not regarding him as a mere interloper."

Special statutes have been enacted giving purchasers at judicial sales the right to apply for a citation to persons interested to determine titles to property sold at judicial sales, and it seems that under some such statutes the motion for the remedy may be made before confirmation.<sup>3</sup>

The right of the purchaser to appear in the confirmation proceedings is recognized in many cases which consider the objections that may be raised by him.<sup>4</sup>

It has been stated that, if a purchaser desires to except to the report of sale, he must file his exceptions before confirmation.<sup>5</sup>

That the successful bidder has a right to be heard in the confirmation proceedings receives indirect support from a number of cases in which such a bidder was permitted to appear and be heard without any question being raised as to his right to do so.<sup>6</sup> of caveat emptor applies in all its strictness to judicial sales, it is not thought that when a purchaser before confirmation shows a failure of the title in some material particular a court of equity may not relieve him of his bid, where it was made under a clear misapprehension of facts alone inducing the bidding, the court thus recognizing the right of such purchaser to be heard in the proceedings for confirmation.

A similar recognition of the right of the purchaser to be heard in the confirmation proceeding appeared in Farmers' Bank v. Peter (1878) 13 Bush. (Ky.) 591, as that case is interpreted in Carter v. Crow (1908) 130 Ky. 41, 112 S. W. 1098.

In Rea v. McEachron (1835) 13 Wend. (N. Y.) 465, 28 Am. Dec. 471, a purchaser at an administrator's sale, who had gone into possession of the land purchased, was held, in an action of ejectment by the heirs of the decedent, to have no title to the land because the sale had not been confirmed; the remedy of such a purchaser being held to be by application to chancery for a confirmation of the sale.

It is recognized in Coltrane v. Baltimore Bldg. & L. Asso. (1903) 126 Fed. 839, that a purchaser may move for the confirmation of a judicial sale.

In Re Kronrot (1910) 182 Fed. 653, where a petition was filed by a third person to set aside a sale of real estate belonging to a bankrupt,—whether before or after confirmation is not clear,—the court recognizes the right of the purchaser to have the sale confirmed if fairly and legally made, and states that, upon the application of the third person, the purchaser was entitled to be heard to the extent of showing that he had rights, and to point out why the discretion of the court should not be exercised against those rights.

It has been held that a purchaser is entitled to file exceptions after the ratification of the sale. Gottschalk Co. v. Samuelson (1916) 128 Md. 541, 97 Atl. 1003. L.R.A.1918C.

Wolfe v. Lynch (1884) 2 Dem. (N. Y.) 610, was decided under a statute which is stated not to recognize the purchaser as a party at any stage of the proceedings or under any circumstances. The court there states that, if the purchaser refuses to comply with the terms of sale, he cannot be coerced by the surrogate court, to which he is in no wise subject.

<sup>3</sup> In the case of the Louisiana statute, it seems a motion to proceed thereunder could be made by the purchaser before confirmation, and would amount to a motion to confirm free from claims of other persons. McDonough v. Copeland (1836) 9 La. 308; State v. Bermudez (1838) 12 La. 352; Ex parte Murray (1843) 6 Rob. (La.) 74.

W. 1201, holding that a purchaser upon a sale of land under a foreclosure decree cannot appear and object to the confirmation of the sale on the ground that the petition did not state a cause of action and was insufficient to support the judgment, nor upon the ground that the property was divisible and should have been sold in separate parcels.

Crume v. McClure (1911) 144 Ky. 723. 139 S. W. 943, in which a purchaser was permitted to appear and be heard in the proceedings for the confirmation of the sale, and object to its confirmation on the ground of a change in his circumstances.

It has been stated that "the authorities establish that a purchaser, by bidding at such sale, becomes a quasi party to the proceeding, and subjects himself to the jurisdiction of the court." From this it follows logically that such a bidder has the right to be heard. And it has been stated that the highest bidder at a judicial sale, to whom the property has been struck off, acquires vested rights which must be respected by the court.<sup>8</sup>

The right of a bidder other than the

In Hughes v. Swope (1889) 88 Ky. 254, 1 S. W. 394, property was struck off at a judicial sale to one who was unable to make payment; the commissioner making the sale, upon being informed thereof, resold the property and struck it off to another at a less price than was originally bid. Messrs. Robert F. Leach, Jr., and S. S. Field for appellees.

Thomas, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In this case, which is a sequel to the case of Baltimore v. Hampton Court Co. 126 Md. 341, 94 Atl. 1018, the suit was brought by the Consolidated Apartment House Company against the mayor and city council of Baltimore, William A. Larkins, commissioner of street cleaning, and James H. Preston, John Hubert, S. S. Field, H. Kent McCay, and James F. Thrift, constituting the board of estimates of Baltimore city, to recover damages for the failure of the city and commissioner of street cleaning to remove the ashes and household refuse from the plaintiff's premises between June 5, 1913, and July 22, 1915, which damages consisted of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in the removal of such ashes and household refuse from its property. The defendants demurred to the declaration, and this appeal is from the judgment of the court below in their favor for costs.

The narr. sets out the following provisions of the charter of Baltimore city (chapter 123 of the Acts of 1898):

"The mayor and city council of Baltimore shall have full power and authority . . . to clean the streets and remove the dirt and filth therefrom, and to prohibit and punish.

by ordinance, the placing of any dirt, filth, or other matter therein, and to protect any pavement by prohibiting the travel thereon."

"The commissioner of street cleaning shall be the head of the fourth subdepartment of public safety. He shall be appointed by the mayor in the mode prescribed by § 25 of this article, and hold his office as therein provided. He shall be charged with the duty of cleaning the streets, as well as the cleaning of the sewers, subject as to the latter to the direction and orders of the city engineer, and shall perform such other duties as may be prescribed by ordinances not inconsistent with this article."

"The mayor and city council of Baltimore shall have full power and authority . . . to levy annually upon the assessable property of the city, by direct tax, with full power to provide by ordinance for collection of the same, such sum of money as may be necessary, in its judgment, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of said city over and exclusive of all expenses, charges, and sums of money which it is, or shall be, required by law to collect for other purposes, subject to the provisions and limitations herein contained."

The narr. also avers that at the time therein mentioned the following ordinances of the mayor and city council of Baltimore were in force:

"The said commissioner of street cleaning shall have exclusive charge of the cleaning of the public streets, lanes, alleys, and of the collection and removal of ashes, garbage, street and household refuse in the city of Baltimore. He shall have and exercise all the powers, and perform all the duties, heretofore performed by the health department in relation to the collection, sale, and removal of ashes, garbage, street offal, and refuse, of the cleaning of public streets, lanes, and alleys, the cleaning away of ice and snow from the gutters and crossings of the same, and from the front of public squares, public buildings, bridges, and public wharves belonging to the city, and the footway of the city spring and public squares."

"It shall be the duty of the commissioner of street cleaning to employ a sufficient number of drivers, horses, and water-tight carts, for each district, for the removal of offal and coal and other ashes from the dwellings and other places within the several districts; and it shall be the duty of the men not only to act as drivers, but also to collect all offal and coal and other ashes as herein provided; and said superintendent shall cause said horses, carts, and drivers to pass through all the streets, lanes, and alleys within their respective districts, in such manner as shall insure the passage of one horse, cart, and driver through each and every street, lane, and alley not less than three times a week, on alternate days, from the 1st day of November until the 1st day of May, and daily (Sundays excepted) from the 1st day of May until the 1st day of November; and they shall give notice to housekeepers of their approach by sounding a trumpet, blowing at the intersection of each street, that may be heard at least one square; and said superintendents shall in no case own, or be interested in the ownership of, said horses or carts."

It is then alleged that the mayor and city council of Baltimore appropriated the sum of $822,658.22 for the needs of the commissioner of street cleaning during the year 1913, and that of that amount $66,500 was for removing garbage, $227,483.22 was for the purpose of collecting garbage and ashes, and $25,000 was for the disposal of nonperishable waste, and that, at the end of the year, there remained an unexpended balance of the appropriation, which was returned to the general treasury of the city; and that for the years 1914 and 1915 there were like appropriations, of which there remained at the end of each year an unexpended balance which was returned to the general treasury of the city; that on or about June 5, 1913, the defendants constituting the board of estimates unlawfully and without authority transmitted to the commissioner of street cleaning an order directing him to cease removing ashes and household refuse from dwelling houses of more than four stories or having an elevator, and that thereafter the commissioner of street cleaning discontinued removing ashes and household refuse from certain apartment houses, including the Plaza, an apartment house owned and managed by the plaintiff, until required to do so by the mandate of the court of appeals, filed June 22, 1915, although frequently requested to remove such ashes, etc.; that the mayor and city council of Baltimore, through its officers and agents, the members of the board of estimates, ordered the discontinuance of the removal of the ashes and household refuse from plaintiff's property; that at no time did the mayor and city council, or any person or officer in its behalf, remove or offer to remove such ashes, etc., from the plaintiff's property between the dates mentioned; and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was compelled to hire teams to remove such ashes, etc., to its great loss and damage.

In this court the only objections to the declaration urged by the appellees in support of their demurrer and the judgment of the court below are (1) that a municipal corporation, unless there is a contract creating or a statute declaring the liability, is not bound to secure execution of its ordinances relating to its public powers, and is not responsible civilly for neglect of duty on the part of its officers in respect to their enforcement; and (2) that the removal of ashes and household refuse "in no wise involves the exercise of the city's corporate function," but that "such acts, from their very nature, are purely governmental."

In reference to the first of these contentions, and leaving out of consideration for the moment the distinction between the corporate and governmental powers of a municipal corporation, it is clear that in this state municipal corporations are liable for the neglect of their officers in respect to the enforcement of municipal ordinances passed in the exercise of powers conferred upon them, except where such corporations are deprived of the power to enforce their ordinances by statute. In Baltimore v. Marriott, 9 Md. 160, 66 Am. Dec. 326, the court, referring to the obligation imposed upon Baltimore city by the provision of its charter authorizing the city to pass all ordinances necessary "to prevent and remove nuisances," said: "In order that the city should relieve itself from this obligation, it was not only necessary that it should pass ordinances sufficient to meet the exigencies of the case, but it was also bound to see that those ordinances were enforced. To pass an ordinance, and not enforce it, would be the same as if none had been passed, so far as the public interests were concerned."

The cases of Taylor v. Cumberland, 64 Md. 68, 54 Am. Rep. 759, 20 Atl. 1027; Cochrane v. Frostburg, 81 Md. 54, 27 L.R.A. 728, 48 Am. St. Rep. 479, 31 Atl. 703; *Hagerstown v. Since the passage of Acts 1867, chap. 367, creating an independent police department for Baltimore city, and imposing upon it the duty of enforcing, within the city limits, all laws and ordinances, this court has held that the mayor and city council of Baltimore were not liable for damages resulting from the violation of the city ordinances by third parties, as distinguished from damages occasioned by the negligent conduct of the city's employees, or its failure to perform a duty imposed upon it. Altwater v. Baltimore, 31 Md. 462; Sinclair v. Baltimore, 59 Md. 592; Taxicab Co. v. Baltimore, 118 Md. 359, 84 Atl. 548; Baltimore v. Walker, 98 Md. 637, 57 Atl. 4; *McCarthy v. 12; and Gutowski v. Baltimore, 127 Md. 502, 96 Atl. 630.

As municipal corporations are liable for any neglect to enforce ordinances passed in the exercise of their corporate powers, except where the power to enforce them is given to an independent board or officer, we are brought to the consideration of the question whether the power granted by its charter to the mayor and city council of Baltimore in reference to the removal of ashes and household refuse is a governmental power, one bestowed upon it as a public agency of the state, or a corporate power, one relating to its local interests or granted for its special advantage.

Learned counsel for the appellees insist that the city's relation to the removal of ashes, etc., is so "closely akin to matters touching health and fire conditions" it "can only be held to be governmental." They cite and rely upon the cases of Wallace v. Baltimore, 123 Md. 638, 91 Atl. 687; Baltimore v. Hampton Court Co. 126 Md. 341, 94 Atl. 1018, and Gutowski v. Baltimore, supra. In Wallace v. Baltimore the court held that a municipality in furnishing water gratuitously to be used in extinguishing fires acts in a governmental capacity; Judge Constable saying: "So practically unanimous have been the decisions denying the liability of the municipality for losses from fire through the alleged negligence in connection with the waterworks that it is impracticable to give all of the authorities so holding."

In Gutowski v. Baltimore, where the negligence complained of was the neglect of the city to enforce an ordinance which prohibited the use of iron hooks in loading a vessel with a cargo of dynamite, and where it was conceded that the place of the accident was not within the corporate limits of the city, but was alleged to be at a point on the river within the jurisdiction and control of the municipality, the court, after deciding against the right of the plaintiff to recover on other grounds, held, as a further reason why the city was not liable, that "the exercise by the city of its authority to provide for the safety of persons or property, where its corporate or proprietary interests do not require such action, is a governmental function for the nonperformance of which it cannot be sued, unless such a right of action is given by statute."

After referring to the many Maryland cases in which the municipality had been held liable for injuries caused by dangerous conditions which it negligently created or permitted to exist in its public thoroughfares, Judge Urner, speaking for the court, said: "In such instances the liability of municipal corporations is sustainable upon the basis of their proprietary interest in the thoroughfares which they are empowered to maintain and keep safe for travel."

And in conclusion he said: "The decisions dealing with such questions recognize the difficulty of drawing a clear and definite line of distinction between municipal duties and powers which are to be regarded as governmental, and those which should be described as corporate in their character, but, with respect to such a situation as the one disclosed in the declaration filed in this suit, we can have no doubt that the asserted duty should properly be included in the former class, and its nonperformance held to be an insufficient ground upon which to require the city to respond to a suit for damages."

These cases recognize the difficulty of determining whether a particular municipal power is governmental or corporate in its character, and are obviously not controlling except where powers of similar nature or character are being considered. The Hampton Court Case is referred to as containing the statement that the mayor and city council of Baltimore had the power to regulate by ordinances the removal of ashes, in exercise of its police powers, and that it could "amend, alter, or repeal the existing ordinances on the subject, and, subject to the limitation that such ordinances must be reasonable in their provisions, could classify the buildings from which such removal should be made at the public expense." In this case, however, we are not concerned with the power of the city to amend and repeal the ordinance in question, but with the nature of the power to pass the ordinance, and the consequences of a failure or neglect to enforce it. We do not understand that case as deciding that the power of the city to provide for the removal of ashes is a part of its police power within the meaning of those cases holding that the police regulations of the city are not made or enforced in the interests of the city in its corporate capacity, but in the interest of the public, and the city is not liable therefor for the acts of its officers in attempting to enforce such regulations. 4 Dill. Mun. Corp. 5th ed. § 1656. That question was not presented by the record, and its decision was not involved in the disposition of the case.

It may be noted that the first provision of the city charter set out in the declaration is found in § 6 of chapter 123 of the Acts of 1898 (city charter) among the powers granted to the city in reference to "Streets, Bridges, and Highways," and that the duty of cleaning the streets and sewers is imposed by the charter upon the commissioner of street cleaning, who by ordinances of the city is given "exclusive charge of cleaning of the public streets, lanes, alleys, and of the collection and removal of ashes, garbage, street and household refuse, . . . the cleaning away of ice and snow from the gutters and crossings of the same." The duties of the city in respect to its streets and highways and its liability for a neglect of those duties have been too frequently and clearly stated to require us to cite cases other than those we have already referred to and those mentioned in Gutowski v. Baltimore. That duty of the city in respect to its streets and highways is derived from the powers and authority given it. As said in Marriott's Case, and repeated in many of the later decisions of this court: "It is a well-settled principle that, when a statute confers a power upon a corporation to be exercised for the public good, the exercise of the power is not merely discretionary, but imperative, and the words 'power and authority' in such case may be construed duty and obligation."

The liability of the municipality in respect to such duties is based not only upon the ground that the statute imposed upon it a duty, but also upon the further fact that it has provided it with the means and clothed it with the power to enforce and discharge that duty. Flynn v. Canton Co. 40 Md. 312, 17 Am. Rep. 603. This liability, however, as already shown, only relates to the powers and duties performed and imposed upon the municipality in its corporate capacity, and not as a public agency of the state; but if the power to pass the ordinance in question is referable to the power conferred upon the city in respect to its streets and highways, then, under the decisions in this state to which reference has already been made, it should be classed among its corporate powers, to which the liability referred to attaches, as distinguished from its governmental powers.

It is said in 4 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 5th ed. § 1665: "The doctrine may be considered as established where a given duty is a corporate one, that is, one which rests upon the municipality in respect to its special or local interests, and not as a public agency of the state, and is absolute and perfect, and not discretionary or judicial in its nature, and is one owing to the plaintiff, or in the performance of which he is specially interested, that the corporation is liable in a civil action for the damages resulting to individuals by its neglect to perform such duty, or for the want of proper care or want of reasonable skill of its officers or servants acting under its direction or authority in the execution of such a duty, and, with the qualifications stated, it is liable on the same principles and to the same extent as an individual or private corporation would be under like circumstances. For illustration, if a city neglects its ministerial duty to cause its sewers to be kept free from obstructions, to the injury of a person who has an interest in the performance of that duty, it is liable, as we shall see, to an action for the damages thereby occasioned. So, if a city owns a wharf or pier and receives wharfage or profit therefrom, it is liable, like an individual or private corporation, for injuries caused by a failure to keep it in proper condition and repair. So in respect to its failure to keep its streets in a safe condition for public use, where this is a duty resting upon it."

In § 1662 of the same volume the learned author says: "A diversity in opinion appears in the decisions as to the liability of a municipal corporation for the negligence or torts of officers and agents of the municipality engaged in the cleaning of streets and in the removal of ashes and garbage from private premises. In some jurisdictions these duties are regarded as governmental in their nature, and any implied liability of the city for the negligence or torts of its employees in the performance of their duties in these matters is denied. But in other jurisdictions the contrary view is adopted, and the municipality has been held impliedly liable for the negligent acts of employees of its department of street cleaning. In other cases the principle that the city acts in a private or corporate capacity, and not in the performance of a governmental function, in the removal of ashes and garbage from the city, has been affirmed by the courts, and the city has, by virtue thereof, been held to be liable for creation of a nuisance in the maintenance of dumps in the vicinity of other property."

In the case of Barney Dumping-Boat Co. v. New York (C. C.) 40 Fed. 50, Justice Wallace said: "The only legal question in the case which merits notice is whether the city is liable for the negligence of the employees of this department. If the duties delegated to him by law are such as primarily devolve upon the city as a municipal or corporate obligation, he and his subordinates are the agents of the city, and the respondents are liable for their acts of misfeasance or nonfeasance done in the course of their ordinary employment. It does not seem reasonable to treat the commissioner [commissioner of street cleaning] as an officer of the general public rather than of the city. His duties, unlike those of the officers of the departments of health, charities, fire, and police, although performed incidentally in the interest of the public health, are more immediately performed in the interest of the corporation itself, which is charged with the obligation of maintaining its streets in fit and suitable condition for the use of those who resort to them. Many cases are reported in the decisions of the state courts in which the city of New York has been held responsible to persons who have sustained injuries in consequence of obstructions which have been negligently suffered to intercept the safe use of the streets. The obligation of the city to keep its streets in such condition that those who use them may do so safely has been repeatedly declared, and the failure to remove ice or snow or dangerous accumulations of any kind by the proper authorities is a breach of that obligation. . . . The duty of cleaning the streets necessarily comprehends the duty of removing such accumulations."

In Quill v. New York, 36 App. Div. 476, 55 N. Y. Supp. 889, 5 Am. Neg. Rep. 423, the action was brought to recover for injuries claimed to have been inflicted upon the plaintiff by an ash and garbage cart belonging to the street cleaning department of the defendant, which was being driven along Manhattan street, and Judge Cullen, in the course of his opinion, said: "The question then is presented: Into which class does the duty imposed by law upon the city of New York to remove the dirt accumulating on the streets, and ashes and garbage from the abutting residences, fall? . . . The learned counsel for the respondent contends that this is a police regulation imposed in the interest of public health; that it is governmental as distinguished from municipal or corporate. . . . Now, the duty or labor imposed on the city by the Consolidation Act as to the removal of garbage and ashes seems to us plainly not the governmental function of abating nuisances, but the private duty which would otherwise rest on residents and property owners within the municipality. . . . The difficulty private parties find, where there is a large and dense population, in properly disposing of their sewage, led to the establishment of public sewers. But in reality it was a private duty assumed by a municipality on account of the difficulty of the citizens individually properly discharging it. The same is equally true of the duty now assumed to remove ashes and garbage. As to the ashes, they are in no sense a menace to health; they are used for filling in lots and low land all through the city. The burden of removing the ashes, if the owner does not wish them to remain longer on his property, is primarily just as much his personal obligation as it was to bring to his premises, in the first instance, the coal from the burning of which the ashes proceeded. As to the garbage, we do not see that it can be distinguished in principle from the case of the sewage. Both are occasioned by the acts of private persons, and on account of the restrictions imposed by urban life, the city discharges the private duty of the members of the municipality which it has become difficult for those members to discharge themselves."

The judgment in favor of the plaintiff was accordingly sustained.

In Hanrahan v. Baltimore City, 114 Md. 517, 80 Atl. 312, this court held the mayor and city council of Baltimore liable for negligence in the construction of a sewer; and in the case of Missano v. New York, 160 N. Y. 123, 54 N. E. 744, 6 Am. Neg. Rep. 652, Judge Bartlett, speaking for the majority of the court, said: "At the time this alleged cause of action accrued it was the duty of the city of New York to keep its streets in repair and to see that they were thoroughly cleaned and kept clean at all times; also to remove the sweepings, ashes, and garbage as often as the public health and use of the streets required it to be done.

The fact that the discharge of this duty might incidentally benefit the public health would not make the acts of the commissioner of street cleaning a public function. It is clear upon principle and authority that the city of New York, in the ordinary and usual care of its streets, both as to the repairs and cleanliness, is acting in the discharge of a special power granted to it by the legislature, in the exercise of which it is a legal individual, as distinguished from its governmental functions, when it acts as a sovereign."

In Denver v. Porter, 61 C. C. A. 168, 126 Fed. 288, the circuit court of appeals, speaking through Judge Hook said: "It is contended with much earnestness and ability by counsel, that in the gathering of refuse and waste of the city, and the establishment, maintenance, and operation of dumping grounds for its ultimate disposal, the officers of the health department were not engaged in the performance of a duty imposed upon the city for its private or corporate profit, pecuniary or otherwise, but that, on the contrary, those officers were the agents and representatives of the public, acting for the public benefit, and that therefore no liability for their negligence rested upon the city; that, although they received their appointment and derived their compensation from the municipality, nevertheless the essential character of their powers and duties determines the identity of their principal, whether the city, on the one hand, or the state, in its sovereign capacity, upon the other; that the powers they were exercising and the duties they were performing pertained to the general police power of the state; and that use was made of the city merely as a convenient mode of exercising the function of government, of accomplishing the purpose of the state through local instrumentalities."

After speaking of the nature of the duties referred to, he said further: "We are of the opinion that in the case before us the removal of waste and refuse from the alleys of the city in the city carts, the deposit thereof upon the dumping grounds near Porter's premises, and the supervision of such work and of the dump itself were of local or municipal concern, and that the officers and employees of the health department of the city, in the discharge of their duties in connection with such work and supervision, were acting as the representatives of the city, for whose negligent acts or omissions it would be liable."

In view of the duties imposed by the charter and the ordinances of the mayor and city council of Baltimore upon the commissioner of street cleaning, and the repeated decisions of this court in regard to the duties and liability of the city in respect to its streets, alleys, and highways, it can hardly be said that the commissioner of street cleaning is an officer of the state, or that the services performed by him are rendered the city as a public agency of the state, and not in its private or corporate capacity. As said by Judge Urner, the city has a proprietary interest in its thoroughfares, and while the removal of ashes and household refuse may contribute to the public health, it also bears a close relation to the obligation of the city to keep its streets and alleys clean and free from obstructions and safe for travel. The fact that the city may by ordinance impose the cost of the removal of ashes, etc., upon property owners, does not alter the nature or character of its duty to provide for such removal. Flynn v. Canton Co. 40 Md. 312, 17 Am. Rep. 603.

In 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations, 5th ed. § 441, Judge Dillon said: "Where the law absolutely requires a ministerial act to be done by a public officer, and he neglects or refuses to do such act without sufficient legal excuse, he may be compelled to respond to an individual who has sustained special damage thereby, to the extent of the injuries arising from his misconduct. Mistake of duty and honest intentions will not relieve him from liability if such liability otherwise exists."

And in the case of Baltimore v. Hampton Court Co. 126 Md. 341, 94 Atl. 1018, Judge Stockbridge, speaking of the duty imposed by the ordinance upon the commissioner of street cleaning to remove ashes, etc., said: "The terms in which this duty is placed upon the commissioner of street cleaning are such as to make its discharge mandatory in character, under the uniform principle of construction frequently declared by this court."

In the case of Amy v. Supervisors (Amy v. Barkholder) 11 Wall. 136, 20 L. ed. 101, Mr. Justice Swayne, speaking for the Supreme Court of the United States, said: "The rule is well settled that, where the law requires absolutely a ministerial act to be done by a public officer, and he neglects or refuses to do such act, he may be compelled to respond in damages to the extent of the injury arising from his conduct. There is an unbroken current of authorities to this effect."

But it is said by Judge Dillon in vol. 1, § 440, of his work on Municipal Corporations, 5th ed: "The liability can only be enforced when three elements are present; viz., (1) that the services of the officer are not gratuitous or coerced, but voluntary and attended with compensation; (2) that the duty to be performed is entire, absolute, and perfect; and (3) that the duty is a personal one, and not only one which he is under obligation, but which he is also clothed with ability, to perform, both in the means furnished to him and the legal authority to act irrespective of superior officers."

In the Hampton Court Case the court also said that the board of estimates had no power to "set at naught the performance of a duty imposed by ordinance upon any department or subdepartment of the city government." The declaration alleges that the board of estimates transmitted to the commissioner of street cleaning "an order directing him to cease removing ashes and household and miscellaneous refuse from dwelling houses of more than four stories or having an elevator," and further alleges that at the end of each of the years mentioned therein there remained "an unexpended balance of the appropriation for the needs of the commissioner of street cleaning," but it is not stated what that balance was, and it nowhere appears from the averments of the narr. that it was sufficient to enable the commissioner of street cleaning to remove the "ashes and household and miscellaneous refuse" from the plaintiff's property. The declaration does not therefore bring the case as to the commissioner of street cleaning within the rule stated by Judge Dillon, which is in accord with the principle upon which municipal corporations are held liable for their failure to discharge duties imposed upon them. Flynn v. Canton Co. supra.

It is said in Kinhead, on Torts, vol. 1, § 41: "All who aid, command, advise, or countenance the commission of a tort by another, or approve it after it is done, if for their benefit, are joint tort-fessors."

And Mr. Poe, in § 467 of vol. 1 of his work on Pleading and Practice, says: "The defendant should be he who actually caused or committed or participated in the commission of a tortious act, or who directed, ordered, or authorized it."

The same rule is stated in 38 Cyc. 485, 486.

The averments of the declaration are sufficient to bring the members of the board of estimates within the rule.

It follows from what has been said that the demurrer should have been sustained as to the commissioner of street cleaning, but that it should be overruled as to the other defendants. The judgment of the court must therefore be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with costs, and new trial awarded.

Annotation—Liability of municipality for injury by employee engaged in removing refuse.

This note supplements a note on the same subject appended to Pass Christian v. Fernandez, 39 L.R.A.(N.S.) 649.

Many other phases of the distinction between public and governmental or private and corporate functions as affecting the liability of municipalities are discussed in notes cited in the L.R.A. Indexes under the title, "Municipal Corporations," subtitle, "Liability for damages."

As pointed out in the earlier note, there is a want of harmony among the cases upon the point whether or not the act of a municipal corporation in gathering and caring for the refuse on its streets is in performance of a governmental function, although the courts are apparently agreed that if it is in the performance of a governmental function, the municipality is not liable for injuries due to the negligence of an employee. It is, however, liable where, in disposing of the refuse collected on its contracts it creates a nuisance to the injury of adjacent property owners.

For example, in Nashville v. Mason (1917) 137 Tenn. 169, L.R.A.1917D, 914, 192 S. W. 915, it is held that even though the collection of garbage by a municipality is a governmental duty and the municipality is not liable for injuries due to the performance thereof, yet where the manner of disposing of the garbage and refuse constitutes a nuisance, the city is liable for the injury thereby caused. To the same effect is Keene v. Huntington (1917) — W. Va. —, L.R.A.1917F, 475, 92 S. E. 119.

In Snider v. High Point (1915) 168 N. C. 608, 85 S. E. 15, it is held that no recovery can be had for the burning of a child due to the negligence of an employee of a municipality in leaving unguarded a pile of burning refuse which he had ignited when there were several small children, including the injured child, playing around the fire. The court said that the acts complained of was in pursuance of authority conferred by law for the public benefit, and came within the principle that unless a right of action is given by statute, a municipality could not be held liable to individuals for failure to perform or for negligence in performing duties which were governmental in their nature.

On the same ground Louisville v. Carter (1911) 142 Ky. 443, 32 L.R.A. (N.S.) 637, 134 S. W. 468, holds that a city is not liable for injury due to the negligence of an employee in running a garbage wagon over a child on the street.

And see upon this point Montain v. Fargo, ante, 600, holding that city officials act in a public and governmental rather than in a private or corporate capacity in overseeing and providing for the removal of the garbage. It is pointed out that the officer in question, the city health officer, filled an office provided for by statute and had all the power and authority conferred by statute upon boards of health.

It has been held that a municipality is liable for piling refuse upon vacant ground to the extent of destroying a sewer, thereby causing surface waters to overflow adjoining lands. Brennan v. Albany (1911) 143 App. Div. 752, 128 N. Y. Supp. 334.

And see also Pass Christian v. Fernandez (1911) 100 Miss. 76, 39 L.R.A. (N.S.) 649, 56 So. 329, holding that the driver of a city cart engaged in removing trash or dirt for the city is not engaged in a governmental duty, and hence the city is liable for injuries caused a child due to such driver's negligence in the performance of his work.

In Gulfport v. Shepperd (1918) — Miss. —, 77 So. 193, however, the court distinguishes Pass Christian v. Fernandez (Miss.) supra, and points out that in that case the city was engaged in caring for its streets and removing garbage, and the injury was due to the negligence of one of its employees, while in the case then before the court, the injury was due to the negligence of an independent contractor appointed by the city to clean cesspools, but paid by the owner of the property, and the work of cleaning the cesspools was done under an ordinance relating to the sanitary conditions of the city. ## MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

DAVID P. KIMBALL et al., Trustees,

v.

CHARLES E. COTTING et al., Trustees.

Tax — income — liability of lessee.

1. The Federal income tax is within a covenant in a lease to pay all taxes which may be payable upon or against the rent for or in respect to the period between the assessment day and the last prior assessment day, or in respect to the period between the first of such assessment days and one calendar year prior thereto, whether levied or assessed upon the same as rental or income.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, II. b, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

Note. — The construction and effect of covenants in lease, sublease, or assignment of lease, as to payment of taxes and assessments, are discussed in the note to J. L. Hammett Co. v. Alfred Peats Co. L.R.A. 1915A, 334. L.R.A.1918C.

Same — retroactive tax — exemption.

2. Income taxes retroactively levied are within a provision in a lease relieving the lessee from payment of any other taxes or excises after establishing a liability for taxes for a period between the first assessment day and one calendar year prior thereto.

For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, II. b, 1, in Dig. 1-52 N. S.

(February 28, 1918.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Suffolk County, without decision, upon an agreed statement of facts, for determination by the Supreme Judicial Court of questions arising in an action brought to recover the amount of a tax deducted and withheld by defendants from rent due to plaintiffs. Judgment for plaintiffs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Felix Rackemann and Harrison M. Davis, for plaintiffs:

The covenant, fairly and reasonably interpreted, covers the tax assessed under the Federal Income Tax Law, which the defendants have deducted and withheld from the rent.

Suter v. Jordan Marsh Co. 225 Mass. 34, 113 N. E. 580; Amory v. Melvin, 112 Mass. 83; J. L. Hammett Co. v. Alfred Peats Co. 217 Mass. 520, L.R.A.1915A, 334, 105 N. E. 370; Pollock v. Farmers Loan & T. Co. 158 U. S. 601, 39 L. ed. 1108, 15 Sup. Ct. Rep. 912.

Messrs. Tyler, Corneau, & Eames, for defendants:

The clause in question was evidently intended to cover taxes which might be assessed upon the rent as rent or income included as a part of the personal property of the taxpayer either under the then existing Massachusetts statute or any similar statute, and it is carefully drawn so as to exclude any other taxes or excises in respect to the rent.

Hough v. North Adams, 196 Mass. 290, 82 N. E. 46; Davis v. Bean, 114 Mass. 358; Wilcox v. Middlesex County, 103 Mass. 544.

Rugg, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question presented is whether the burden of the Federal income tax on the rent reserved in a lease of real estate in Boston, of which the owners and lessors are the plaintiffs, and the lessees are the defendants, must be borne by the former or by the latter. The answer to that question depends upon the words of the lease. It is dated in 1902 for a term of ninety-nine years. One of its covenants provides comprehensively that the lessees shall pay "all taxes, charges, assessments, betterments, and liens" in any way assessed and levied upon or payable for or in respect of the demised premises. Another covenant upon which the decision must turn is this: "The lessees covenant and agree to pay and discharge any taxes or excises which during the term may on any assessment day be lawfully levied or assessed to either the lessors or the lessees upon or against the rent payable hereunder [forty-first word] for or in respect of the period between such assessment day and the last prior assessment day, or for or in respect of the period between the first of such assessment days and one calendar year prior thereto, whether levied or assessed upon the same as rental or income, but not for any other taxes or excises in respect thereof."

This covenant relates exclusively to the payment of taxes and excises levied upon the rent reserved by the lease. It concerns no other subject. It expressly includes such taxes and excises whether levied against the lessors or the lessees. It makes no difference with the scope of the covenant whether the burden is imposed by the law upon the one or the other. In either event the lessees are liable by contract of the parties, so far as that point goes. If the covenant ended with "hereunder," its forty-first word, the lessees undoubtedly would be liable.

But the covenant contains additional words. Further reference is made to "any assessment day," and the obligation assumed by the lessees to pay rent is limited by the words, "for or in respect of the period between such assessment day and the last prior assessment day." It is manifest from words following in the covenant that it was the purpose of the parties to impose the obligation upon the lessee whether the tax was levied as a property or as an income tax. See in this connection Tax Comrs. v. Putnam, 227 Mass. 522, and cases collected at 531, 532, L.R.A.1917F, 806, 116 N. E. 904. An income tax necessarily has reference to moneys received during a specified period of time. At any single moment one can hardly be said to have income. Duration of time is required for its measurement. On the other hand, a property tax requires a definite moment for its assessment, in order that its items and their value may be measured by reference to a known or ascertainable standard. Since, by express words of the covenant, the lessee is liable for the tax, whether levied upon the rent "as rental or as income," it inevitably follows that it was the intent of the parties that the words "assessment day" were not intended to refer immutably to a single date, but were designed to include whatever period, not exceeding that elapsing between two successive assessment days, might be established by any tax law thereafter enacted as the measurement of the income.

The reference to the "assessment day" cannot under these circumstances be construed as referring exclusively to the 1st of May or the 1st of April, one or the other of which has been the state assessment date for a long time.

The Federal Income Tax Law here in question was approved October 3, 1913, U. S. Stat. 1913, chap. 16, 38 Stat. at L. 114, 168, Comp. Stat. 1916, § 5291. It expressly provides in § D, § II. that the income tax shall be computed upon the net income "during each preceding calendar year ending December 31st." That fixes the last day of each calendar year as the "assessment day" for that kind of tax, as definitely as was the 1st day of May fixed for the year ending on that date by Rev. Laws, chap. 12, § 4, for the state income tax in force when the lease was executed. The return to be made by the taxpayer under each law is filed at some later time, and the actual completion of the tax is made later still. But the "assessment day" is as definite under one statute as under the other, so far as it concerns a tax on income.

It is manifest that the parties intended to include both state and Federal taxes by the covenant. There is no express limitation to one or the other by the words of the covenant. In its absence it would be difficult to read into the covenant such a limitation by inference. Under our Constitution and laws in force at the time the lease was executed, a tax levied in respect of income from rents of real estate was a property and not an excise tax. Opinion of Justices, 220 Mass. 613-623, 627, 108 N. E. 579; Perkins v. Westwood, 226 Mass. 266-276, 115 N. E. 411. It would seem that the Federal income tax under various statutes has been regarded as an excise. See Brushaber v. Union P. R. Co. 240 U. S. 1-17, 60 L. ed. 493-501, 36 Sup. Ct. Rep. 236, Ann. Cas. 1917B, 713, L.R.A.1917D, 414. The covenant relates to both property taxes and excises.

It had been held long before the date of the lease here in question that a Federal income tax might be retroactive, and might cover a period of time and an income already taxed by another tax statute. Stockdale v. Atlantic Ins. Co. 20 Wall. 323, 331, 22 L. ed. 348. The extent of such retroactivity, which would be held legal, has not been determined, so far as we are aware. But the final limitation of the covenant relieving the lessee from "other taxes or excises" would bar his liability for such taxes retroactively levied beyond the express limitation of the covenant. Thus, effect is given to all the words of the covenant. Although the case at bar is not governed by Suter v. Jordan Marsh Co. 225 Mass. 34, 113 N. E. 580, it falls within the same class, and is distinguishable from Codman v. American Piano Co. — Mass. —, 118 N. E. 344.

Insurance — accident — erysipelas.

Death from erysipelas is not accidental within the meaning of a policy insuring against death by accidental means, if it was caused by germs entering upon the breaking of the scab on a boil when scratched with unclean hands to allay itching.

recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of accident insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Argued before Buffington, McPherson, and Woolley, Circuit Judges.

Mr. Maurice W. Sloan for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Julius C. Levi and David Mandel, Jr., for defendant in error.

McPherson, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

Irma Spitz, the widow of Samuel Spitz and the plaintiff in this action, recovered on a policy in her favor, which insured her husband in the Maryland Casualty Company against injury and death, "effected directly and independently of all other causes through external, violent, and accidental means." He died while the policy was in force, and one of the questions in the court below was whether his death was "effected . . . through . . . accidental means."

The liability under an accident policy for sickness or death caused by blood poisoning is treated in the notes to Cary v. Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. 5 L.R.A.(N.S.) 926; and Ballagh v. Interstate Business Men's Acci. Asso. L.R.A.1917A, 1056; and see later case, Anderson v. Great Eastern Casualty Co. L.R.A.1918B, 1194. As to liability under an accident policy for condition caused by external infection without cut or abrasion, see note to Sullivan v. Modern Brotherhood, 42 L.R.A.(N.S.) 140, and later case, Railway Mail Asso. v. Dent, L.R.A.1915A, 314.

Other notes of collateral interest are referred to in those already cited.

Before stating the facts it may be well to consider briefly the quoted words.

They do not mean simply that death shall be accidental, that is, unintended or unexpected or unforeseen; but that the means or the cause of death shall be accidental. It is this to which the policy directs particular attention, and if the means be not accidental the death is not insured against. The words "accident" and "accidental" have been many times considered, and the numerous cases on this subject need not be reviewed. Their general meaning is not in doubt, and the Standard Dictionary's definition of "accidental" will serve as well as another: "Accidental: (1) Happening or coming by chance or without design; casual; fortuitous."

Accidental, therefore, is opposed to design, and a means is not accidental when it is employed intentionally, although it may produce a result not expected or intended. The intentional use of a means may produce more than one result; one may be likely and another unlikely to happen; but a result that is the natural, direct, and probable effect of such use must be regarded as intended, and cannot be regarded as accidental. The rule is thus stated in 14 R. C. L. § 418, p. 1238: "While it may be true that an accident is an event which takes place without one's foresight or expectation, and is undesigned, it is not true that every unforeseen, undesigned, and unexpected event is an accident. A result which, though not designed, foreseen, or expected, is yet the natural and direct effect of acts voluntarily done or of conditions voluntarily assumed, cannot be said to be accidental."

See also the cases on this subject to be found in Fidelity & C. Co. v. Carroll (1906) 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 657, and note (74 C. C. A. 409, 143 Fed. 271, 6 Ann. Cas. 955) and in Hutton v. States Acci. Ins. Co. (1915) L.R.A.1915E, 127, and note (267 Ill. 267, 108 N. E. 296, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 577). In the recent case of Preferred Acci. Ins. Co. v. Patterson (1914) 130 C. C. A. 177, 213 Fed. 597, this court had occasion to say: "We agree that when a man is injured while doing merely what he intends to do he is not injured by an accident, unless the course of his action has been interrupted or deflected by some unforeseen and unintended happening. To illustrate from the facts before us: Since the deceased was attempting to start the engine of his car by turning the crank, whatever injury he might sustain from the ordinary strain of that operation would properly be regarded as a result of what he intended to do, and therefore would not be accounted accidental. But we can hardly suppose that he intended to slip and fall in the course of the operation, and therefore if he did slip and fall, and sustained injury as the direct result thereof, the happening would be unforeseen and unintended, and the injury would be accidental."

Turning now to the evidence and giving it the weight most favorable to the plaintiff, we discover the facts to be as follows:

The insured died of erysipelas on January 22, 1915. Late in December a boil or furuncle had appeared on the back of his neck, and for this he was treated at the office of a doctor. About January 1 his condition was improved. How long afterwards he wore a bandage does not clearly appear, but in any event a healthy scab had formed, the doctor had discharged him, and he was able to be about his business. He was a butcher, and on January 4 was engaged in cleaning chickens, a work that soiled his hands with blood and other substances. In this situation his neck began to itch, and in order to relieve the irritation he put up his hand and rubbed or scratched the offending place (whether bandaged or not), with the result that he broke the scab. The only witnesses on this point were the plaintiff and the doctor, and the relevant testimony may be summarized as follows: On the morning of January 4 the deceased was at a block in the rear of his shop cleaning chickens, and his wife was in the front making out bills. She heard him say, "I have broken the scab on my neck," whereupon she turned and saw his hand rubbing his neck. She told him to quit it; his hand was not clean and had left some blood on the neck, and the scab was broken. Soon after the work of cleaning was done he went upstairs and washed his neck with peroxide. The doctor testified: "He told me he had rubbed it off or scratched it off the day prior. He said he rubbed his neck, it itched him, it was right in there; it hurt him and he found he had rubbed off the scab."

In a short time he became sick with erysipelas and died from this disease on January 22. The verdict has established, and we therefore assume the further fact to be, that the germs of erysipelas entered the wound after the scab had been rubbed or scratched off, and that the disease then introduced was the immediate cause of death: so that the only question now is whether the means that opened the way for the germs to enter, namely, the rubbing or scratching of the boil, was an accidental means.

The court submitted this question to the jury, asking them to find whether the injury was inflicted accidentally, and in this submission we think there was error. As we read the testimony, nothing appears to show that the injury was inflicted by accidental means. The deceased rubbed or scratched his neck in the ordinary way; there is no evidence that he was disturbed or interfered with during the operation, and an ordinary and not unusual result followed; that is, he broke the scab. His hands were not clean, but he knew that fact and must be held to the risk of such harm as might follow therefrom. In a word, he seems to have done just what he intended to do, namely, rub or scratch his neck to relieve the itching, and in our opinion breaking the scab during the process was a probable result, one reasonably to be expected. We think the defendant was entitled to binding instructions.

The judgment is reversed.

A motion for reargument having been filed the following Per Curiam response was handed down on December 31, 1917:

The motion for reargument suggests that United States Mut. Acci. Asso. v. Barry, 131 U. S. 100, 33 L. ed. 60, 9 Sup. Ct. Rep. 755, was probably overlooked, and relies upon that decision as a controlling authority. We did not overlook that case, however, but considered and still consider it to be distinguishable. On page 121 of the report in 131 U. S. the Supreme Court approves the following instruction as correct: "That, if a result is such as follows from ordinary means, voluntarily employed, in a not unusual or unexpected way, it cannot be called a result effected by accidental means."

And this instruction seems to us to cover the present situation, where, as we have already said, "nothing appears to show that the injury was inflicted by accidental means. The deceased rubbed or scratched his neck in the ordinary way; there is no evidence that he was disturbed or interfered with during the operation, and an ordinary and not unusual result followed, that is, he broke the scab. His hands were not clean, but he knew that fact, and must be held to the risk of such harm as might follow therefrom. In a word, he seems to have done just what he intended to do, namely, rub or scratch his neck to relieve the itching, and in our opinion breaking the scab during the process was a probable result, one reasonably to be expected."

The motion is refused.

Garrigues, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Charles De Rose was convicted of forgery in the court below, and sentenced to a term in the penitentiary.

The information charged that he feloniously and falsely made and forged a certain order, warrant, and request for the payment of money by the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, to wit, a certain railway time roll, and did feloniously utter, publish, pass, and attempt to pass as true and genuine, a certain false order, warrant, and request for the payment of money by the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company, to L.R.A.1918C.

wit, a railway time roll, with intent to damage and defraud the company.

On motion for a bill of particulars, the prosecution furnished defendant with a copy of the instrument alleged to have been forged and uttered, which is a time sheet or railroad time roll containing the names of men who worked on the Tennessee pass section; the time they worked and rate and amount of compensation due each for the month of December, 1915, which defendant as section foreman made and certified as correct and sent in to the roadmaster.

The evidence shows that defendant was section boss or foreman on the Tennessee pass section; that a part of his duties was to make out and send in the time roll of the men who were working for him on the section at the end of the month; that he "padded" the time roll for the month of December, 1915, by crediting Albert De Rose with more days than he had worked during that month. The customary method of paying section men was for the foreman to make out the time roll at the end of the month, certify it as correct, and send it to the office of the roadmaster, where it was checked over, countersigned, and sent to the superintendents' office as the basis of the pay roll. The time roll remains in the superintendents' office, and the pay roll is made up from it and sent to the treasurer's office in Denver, from which office the pay checks, when written, are sent to the men whose names appear on the roll. In this instance the fraud was discovered in the roadmaster's office before the pay roll was made up.

The court instructed the jury: "(3) Under the Statutes of Colorado, the fabrication of any false instrument with intent to defraud, or the attempt to pass such instrument with like intent, is forgery, even though there is no forged indorsement by the payee. The crime does not consist in accomplishing the fraud, but in attempting it by prohibited means, and if you should find from the evidence that Charles De Rose placed the name of Albert De Rose upon the pay roll with intent to defraud the Denver & Rio Grande Railroad Company out of pay for any number of days you will find him guilty of forgery."

The statute provides: "Every person who shall falsely make, alter, forge or counterfeit . . . any order or warrant or request for the payment of money . . . with intent to damage or defraud any person or persons, body politic or corporate . . . ; or shall utter, publish, pass, or attempt to pass as true and genuine, or cause to be uttered, published, passed, or attempted to be passed, as true and genuine, any of the above-named false, altered, forged or counterfeited matters as above specified and described, knowing the same to be false, altered, forged or counterfeited, with intent to prejudice, damage or defraud any person or persons, body politic or corporate . . . ; every person so offending shall be deemed guilty of forgery." (Rev. Stat. 1908, § 1704.)

1. This writing is what it purports to be,—a true and genuine instrument,—although it contains false statements. It is not a false paper, and the execution of such a document does not constitute forgery. The prosecution failed to distinguish between falsely making an instrument and making a false instrument, and this paper was not falsely made or forged. To forge or counterfeit an instrument is to falsely make it. The term "falsely make" as used in the statute refers to the paper itself as being false, and not to the truth or falsity of its statements. The statute refers to the false making or altering, and not to the tenor of the writing or the facts stated therein. A false statement of fact in an instrument which is itself genuine, by which another person is deceived and defrauded, is not forgery. State v. Young, 46 N. H. 266, 88 Am. Dec. 212; Territory v. Gutierrez, 13 N. M. 312, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 375, 84 Pac. 525; United States v. Glasener (D. C.) 81 Fed. 566. So in this case, defendant, when he made up and signed the time roll, did not make a false writing. The document itself is genuine, and the fact that he made a false statement in the writing does not constitute the crime of forgery.

The judgment of the lower court is reversed.

Scott, J., not participating.

Annotation—Is the making of a false instrument within a criminal statute directed against the false making of an instrument.

This note supplements the note to Territory v. Gutierrez, 5 L.R.A. (N.S.) 375.

The decision in DE ROSE v. PEOPLE, ante, 1193, that the act of defendant in making up a genuine time roll, which contained false statements, did not constitute a false making within the meaning of a statute providing that persons who should "falsely make" an order or warrant for the payment of money with intent to defraud another should be guilty of forgery, is in harmony with the prior cases which have passed upon the question under annotation. No cases upon the question subsequent to the earlier note have been disclosed.

Messrs. Stout, Rose, & Wells, for appellees:

The allegation of a promissory engagement to marry and the assertion of the relation of a fiancée afford no standing to plaintiff as a suitor for the maintenance of an action for enticement or alienation. Allegations of marriage and the relationship of husband and wife are indispensable. Unlawful interference with the conjugal rights and privileges of a spouse, based on an existing relation of marriage, is an essential requisite to the maintenance of a suit for enticement and alienation.

Morrissey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

From an order sustaining a demurrer to the petition and dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. The petition alleges that the plaintiff and one Bangs, now deceased had, during the lifetime of Bangs, entered into an agreement to marry. That they had agreed upon the date when the ceremony should be performed, and that each of the parties was capable of entering into the marriage relation. "That the said defendants each jointly and severally, maliciously, wrongfully, unlawfully, and without just cause, and to advance their own pecuniary interests, interposed objections to the said L.R.A.1918C.

Stephen D. Bangs carrying out his said contract with plaintiff, and through threats they they would place him in a sanitarium and have him removed out of the circle of society in which he was known and had lived, and through falsely representing that plaintiff was of an unchaste character, and by unlawful restraint and undue influence, caused the said Stephen D. Bangs not to fulfil his said contract of marriage with plaintiff, and caused the said Stephen D. Bangs to breach and break his said contract of marriage with plaintiff. That on the 4th day of November, 1914, said Stephen D. Bangs was ready and willing to marry the plaintiff, and but for the wrongful interference of the said defendants as aforesaid he was then and there able to do so. Plaintiff states: That, by reason of the said wrongful acts of the said defendants in causing the breach of the said contract of marriage, plaintiff sustained the loss of an advantageous matrimonial connection, the said Stephen D. Bangs being a man of wealth at the date set for the wedding, and a man of social position. That plaintiff's affections have been disregarded and blighted, she has been disappointed in her affections, and her spirit and feelings wounded, resulting in great mental distress and humiliation, and she has been damaged in the sum of $200,000, no part of which has been paid."

The cause of action for slander was barred by the Statute of Limitations and is not relied upon by plaintiff, but her action seems to be for enticement or alienation of her fiancé. We are cited to no authority that sanctions a recovery under such circumstances. Where the marriage relation exists and third parties entice away the spouse or alienate the affections, a recovery is allowed; but the cause of action rests upon the right to the society, companionship, conjugal affections, and fellowship of the estranged spouse. There is no such right in the fiancé. An alienation suit, therefore, is maintainable only for interference with the conjugal rights of the plaintiff.

"The prevention of a marriage by the interference of a third person cannot in general, in itself, be a legal wrong. Thus if one, by solicitations or by the arts of ridicule or otherwise, shall induce one to break off an existing contract of marriage, no action will lie for it, however contemptible and blamable may be the conduct. But a loss of marriage may be such a special injury as will support an action of slander or libel, where the party was induced to break off the engagement by false and damaging charges not actionable per se. Here the action, it is perceived, is for the defamation, and the loss of the marriage only the damage flowing from the injury. A contemplated marriage might be prevented by the forcible separation of the parties, or by the imprisonment of one of them; but the wrong in contemplation of law would consist in the assault, or in the false imprisonment, and not in the loss of marriage. The suit might therefore lie in favor of one party, and not in favor of the other, if only one was subjected to the illegal force." Cooley, Torts. 2d ed. p. 277.

It is not claimed that she was imprisoned or in any way restrained of her liberty. Under no circumstances could she recover for the restraint or false imprisonment of Bangs. The right of engaged parties to ask the advice of their friends and the right of the friends to give advice have never been denied. To hold that a third party may be subject to answer in damages for advising or inducing an engaged person to break the engagement might result in a suit by every disappointed lover against his successful rival. The state has an interest in the marriage relation, and until the marriage is solemnized no domestic rights exist and therefore cannot be violated.

The ruling of the trial court is without error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Annotation—Liability of third person for inducing breach of marriage contract.

The general question as to the right of action for damages for inducing a breach of contract is covered in notes in 16 L.R.A.(N.S.) 746; 28 L.R.A.(N.S.) 615, and L.R.A.1915F, 1076. It is pointed out in these notes that one may be liable for maliciously interfering with and inducing a breach of contract. As to marriage contracts, however, the law has not been sufficiently developed to render it safe to formulate any rules from the few cases considering the point. According to these cases, there is no liability on the part of a third person for inducing the breach of a marriage contract, even though the act was done maliciously and wrongfully and accomplished by means of threats and false representations. This is the doctrine of HOMAN v. HALL, ante, 1195, and Leonard v. Whetstone (1903) 34 Ind. App. 383, 107 Am. St. Rep. 252, 68 N. E. 197.

To the same effect see Davis v. Condit (1914) 124 Minn. 365, 50 L.R.A.(N.S.) 142, 144 N. W. 1089, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 544, holding that an affianced husband has no right of action against a third person for maliciously debauching and seducing his affianced wife, alienating her affections, and interfering with the marriage contract then subsisting between the plaintiff and such affianced wife.

No reason is advanced by these cases why a different rule should be applied to persons who maliciously induce the breach of a marriage contract than is applied to persons who maliciously induce a breach of other contracts. To sustain liability in such cases would not render a parent or other person liable, L.R.A.1918C who in good faith gave advice to one of the parties in such contract which lead to the breach thereof, nor would it render a parent liable for in good faith using his parental position to oppose and prevent the marriage of his child, provided he resorted to no unlawful means; neither would such a rule render a third person liable for a breach of the contract, induced by his or her entering into a similar contract with one of the parties thereto. Upon this latter point it is queried in National Phonograph Co. v. Edison-Bell Consol. Phonograph Co. 96 L. T. N. S. (Eng.) 218, that "sometimes it happens that a lady, having contracted to marry A, is induced to change her mind and marry B, it must be presumed, upon a pressing invitation by him to do so. If B was aware of the lady's previous engagement to A, can A, instead of bringing an action for breach of promise against the lady, recover damages in an action of tort against her husband B, upon the ground that he has interfered with a contractual relation between the lady and A, and induced her to break her contract? Could A, if he commenced his action soon enough, obtain an injunction against B, to restrain him from procuring the lady to marry him?"

In Delage v. Normandeau (1899) Rap. Jud. Quebec 9 B. R. 93, the father was held not liable for inducing his son to breach a contract of marriage, where it appeared that the son refused to perform the contract and breached the same upon his own initiative, and without being influenced by the father. CHRISTOPHER C. BYRNE

v.

PITTSBURGH BREWING COMPANY,
Appt.

(— Pa. —, 103 Atl. 53.)

Master and servant — authority to employ guide.

The driver of a delivery truck attempting to deliver goods on a country road has no implied authority to employ a guide to assist him in reaching his destination when he finds the regular route closed to travel, if verbal directions would be sufficient for that purpose, and therefore his master is not liable for injury to a guide so employed through defective condition of the truck.

Note. — The liability of a master for injury to an emergency assistant is treated in the note to St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Bagwell, 40 L.R.A. (N.S.) 1180, which includes cases turning, as does BYRNE v. PITTSBURGH BREWING CO., upon the implied authority of a servant to employ another person to assist him in an emergency. A somewhat related question is discussed in the notes to Grissom v. Atlanta & B. Air Line R. Co. 13 L.R.A. (N.S.) 561; Hunter v. Corrigan, 43 L.R.A.1918C.

arose occurred in this way: The defendant company, in the conduct of its business, maintains and operates several gasoline motor trucks which it employs in the delivery of its brewery products to its customers in the surrounding country. One of these customers was the proprietor of what is known as the Byrne Hotel, located on the Butler plank road about 10 miles from the city of Pittsburgh. To fill an order for beer and ice it had received from this hotel, it loaded one of these trucks with the goods required, placed it in charge of a driver who had been in its employ for about seven or eight years and had frequently driven over the route, with directions to make the delivery. This employee drove out the Butler pike, a road running parallel with the plank road and with which he was familiar, until he reached a point nearly opposite the Byrne Hotel on the plank road. At this point there is a crossroad about a half mile in length leading directly across to the plank road, connecting at or near the hotel, and which he was accustomed to take in making his deliveries. He found this short piece of road impassable in consequence of repairs that were being made to it. Leaving his motor truck with its load in charge of a man who for unexplained reason had been riding with him, he walked over to the hotel, and there met this plaintiff, a son of the proprietor, whom he well knew, told him of the fact that he had the goods for delivery on his truck, where the truck was, but that the condition of the road over from the pike prevented his reaching the hotel by that way, and asked to be informed how to get across by another way. The plaintiff told him that by continuing on the pike for about a mile he would come to another crossroad leading directly from the pike across to the plank road to a point about a mile beyond the hotel. The driver asked him to walk back with him to the motor truck and ride with him from that point over the route he had suggested, as he was afraid of getting lost if he attempted it alone. The plaintiff declined, giving as his reason that he was needed about the hotel, it being near the dinner hour, but on being again requested he consented. Together they walked to the motor truck, the plaintiff there taking a seat with the driver on the truck, as did also the man whom the driver had left in charge of the truck and its load, and who was an entire stranger to the plaintiff. Together the three proceeded on their way up the pike until they reached the crossroad, where they turned to the right into the crossroad. They had nearly reached the end of this road, were very close to the plank road, when towards the foot of a declivity, the truck having then gotten beyond the control of the driver, it ran into a gully, with the result that the truck was thrown over an embankment, and the plaintiff met the injury for which he brought his action. He based his right to recover on the ground that the proximate cause of the accident was defective brakes on the motor truck because of which the driver was unable to control the speed of the truck on the declivity. The verdict of the jury awarding the plaintiff damages in $3,983 implies a finding of negligence on the part of the defendant in the respect indicated. At the conclusion of the testimony defendant's counsel asked for binding instructions in favor of the defendant. This was refused. A motion for judgment non obstante followed which was also refused, and judgment was accordingly entered on the verdict. Of the errors assigned on the appeal, one only need be considered.

If the plaintiff is entitled to recover at all against this defendant, it must be because he stood in the relation of servant or employee of the defendant and was in the course of his employment when he sustained his injury. It may be technically inexact to speak of plaintiff as a volunteer, since it is not disputed that he accompanied the driver on the truck at the latter's request; but that it is an immaterial matter, since it is clear that he had no other right to be upon the truck except such as he acquired from the driver. Except as the driver could confer such right, the plaintiff stood in no relation with the defendant whatever, and the latter owed him no duty of protection. It is a rule universally recognized that the relation of master and servant cannot be imposed on a person without his consent, express or implied. It is upon the exception to this general rule, which is quite as well settled as the general rule itself, that the plaintiff relies to establish the relation of master and servant in this case. The exception is that a servant may engage an assistant in the case of an emergency, where he is unable to perform the work alone. Both rule and exception have been repeatedly recognized and enforced in our own cases, notably in the case of Flower v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 69 Pa. 210, 8 Am. Rep. 251, 12 Am. Neg. Cas. 524, and of Wischam v. Richards, 136 Pa. 109, 10 L.R.A. 97, 20 Am. St. Rep. 900, 20 Atl. 532, and neither calls for discussion further than to ascertain whether, from the evidence adduced on behalf of the plaintiff, it can be rightfully determined: (1) That the conditions existing when the driver requested the plaintiff to accompany him were such that the driver would be in danger of becoming lost and long delayed in reaching the place of delivery if he attempted the road he was advised to take, unaccompanied by someone familiar with it; and (2) whether, if the evidence warrants an affirmative answer, the conditions testified to constitute such an emergency as would warrant the driver in employing the plaintiff in such way as to make him a servant of the defendant, entitled to a servant's rights of protection. These were the questions in the case, and the burden of establishing both affirmatively was upon the plaintiff. They may be considered together.

No one knew better than the plaintiff, because of his admitted knowledge of and familiarity with the road which he had advised the plaintiff to adopt, what, if any, risk or danger the driver would run of missing the road or losing himself if he chose it. All that was required was that he should continue on the road which he had traveled, the Butler pike, for a distance of about one mile, when he would reach a short crossroad about a half or three quarters of a mile in length and the only crossroad he would encounter, one that led over to the plank road on which was located the hotel at which the delivery was to be made, this crossroad being, as plaintiff himself testified, in excellent condition and in no way confusing, since no other roads led from it. When the plaintiff was asked whether on the road he described it would be possible for the driver to get lost, his only reply was that he "did not suppose anybody would get lost as long as they had a tongue." Nowhere in his testimony does he pretend that in acceding to the request of the driver to accompany him he did so in order to save him from mistaking the road; but, on the contrary, he repeatedly asserted that his only purpose in accompanying him was to save time. How this was to result he nowhere says. Nor does a single witness testify that the situation in which the driver found himself called for any guidance whatever. On the case as presented by the plaintiff and his witnesses, it is simply incredible that in the L.R.A.1918C.

conditions there present, traveling from one thoroughfare over an established side or crossroad for a half or three quarters of a mile to another main thoroughfare which he wished to reach, a full-grown man and an experienced driver in such a country as that is would be in danger of losing himself. It is none the less incredible that under the conditions shown to have existed such a one could be left in uncertainty as to the particular road he was advised to take. This is the turning point in the case. Did there exist a necessity for the plaintiff's assistance? Did an emergency actually exist? The law in such cases is thus stated in Fiesel v. New York Edison Co. 123 App. Div. 676, 108 N. Y. Supp. 130: "An emergency employee, called on by another employee to assist him, for however short a time, becomes a fellow servant and subject to the rules of law applicable to the injury of a servant by his fellow. But he must be so called on as of necessity in order to make him an employee, for a servant has no authority to call on another to help him in his master's business as of necessity, unless the necessity exists. If he can do the work himself there is no occasion of necessity to imply power in him to employ assistance."

This is simply the common-law rule. At the furthest, the assistance rendered by the plaintiff in this case may be construed as serving the convenience or pleasure of the driver; but this comes far short of a necessity calling for assistance. The emergency as used in the rule implies necessity for assistance. Manifestly here was no emergency. There is absolutely nothing in the evidence which brings the defendant into any relation with the plaintiff out of which a duty of protection could possibly arise. The case called for judgment non obstante, and it was error to refuse it.

The judgment entered is accordingly reversed, and judgment is here entered for the defendant.

Petition for rehearing denied.
